to the number of nearly 20 species. The common two- or three-spined stickleback, leustickle, burnstickle, or tit thebat, is A. leustichus, 4 inches long. Another is the nine- or ten-spined, Pinnosteus pungitius. The fifteen-spined stickleback, or sea-stickleback, is Spinachia rhombus, of the northern coasts of Europe, a marine species, from 3 to 7 inches long, of very slender elongate form, with a tubular snout. They are among the most characteristic fishes of the northern hemisphere in the colder regions. Except in the breeding season, they live in shoals, and are sometimes numerous enough to become of commercial value for their oil or for manure. They are noted for the construction of elaborate nests which the male builds for the eggs, in which several females often or generally deposit their burden. The eggs are comparatively few, and while being hatched are assiduously guarded by the male. The local or popular synonyms of the sticklebacks are numerous, among them prickleback, sprickleback, stickling, and sharppling.

Nest of Stickleback.

stigma¹ (stig'mä), n.; E. pl. stigmata (stig'mäz). Used chiefly in senses 1, 2, and 6; L. pl. stigmata (stig'mä-tä), used more or less in all the senses. [= F. stigmater = Sp. P. g. stigma = It. stimate, stigma = G. stigma, < NL. stigma, < L. stigma, < Gr. στίγμα, pl. στίγματα, a mark, esp. of a pointed instrument, a spot, brand, < στίξω, mark (with a point), prick, brand; see stick.] 1. A mark made with a red-hot iron, formerly in many countries upon criminals as a badge of infamy; a brand impressed on slaves and others.

The Devil, however, does not imprint any stigma upon his new vassal, as in the later stories of witch-compacts.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 95.

2. Any mark of infamy, slur, or disgrace which attaches to a person on account of evil conduct.

Happy is it for him that the blackest stigma that can be fastened upon him is that his robes were whiter than his brethren's.

E. Hall, Remains, Pref.

3. In anat. and zool., a mark; a marked point or place; variously applied to marks of color, as a spot, and to many different pores or small holes. Specifically—(a) A birth-mark; a nevus. (b) The point or place on the surface of an ovary where a mature Graafian follicle ruptures. (c) In ornith., the place where the calyx or ovicel of the ovary ruptures to discharge an ovum into the oviduct. See calyx, 3 (b), (d) In entom.: (1) The exterior orifice of a trachea; a spiracle. See cut under pulmonaria, ph-sh-fu, choepet and Acarida. (2) A chitinous spot or mark on the anterior margin of the forewings of many insects, formed by a special enlargement of a vein; a pterostigma. (3) In Prologia, a spot of pigment; the so-called eye of an infusorian. (4) In Annulida, one of the pores or openings of the segmental organs. (5) In Hydrozoa, the pore by which a pneumostome opens to the exterior. See cut under Hydrozoa. (6) In Pharyngoglossata, as an ascidian, one of the dilated openings by which the cavity of the pharynx is placed in communication with that of the atrial canal. See cut under Appendicularia and Tunicata.

4. A place or point on the skin which bleeds periodically or at irregular intervals during some mental states. The spontaneous appearance of stigmata was formerly regarded superstitiously.—5. pl. In the Rom. Cath. Ch., marks said to have been supernaturally impressed upon the bodies of certain persons in imitation of the wounds on the crucified body of Christ.

In the life of St. Francis of Assisi we have the first example of the alleged miraculous infliction of stigmata.

Encyc. Brit., XXII. 549.

6. In bot., a modified part of the style or, when that is wanting, of the surface of the ovary, which in impregnation receives the pollen. In the latter case the stigma is said to be sessile, as in the poppy and the tulip. When the style is present, the stigma may be terminal, occupying its summit, as in the plum and cherry, or lateral, running down its face in one or two lines, as in Ranunculus. Its form and appearance are very various. In many plants there is only one stigma, while in others there are two, three, five, or many, according to the number of styles or style-branches. The stigma is composed of delicate cellular tissue; its surface is destitute of true epidermis, and is usually moist. See pistil (with cut) and pollen-tube.

stigma² (stig'mä), n. [Gr. στίγμα, the ligature σ, an altered form, to bring in σ, of σίγμα or σίγμα, the letter σ, σ, sigma; see sigma.] The ligature was also called στίγμα. In Gr. gram. and paleog., a ligature (σ) still sometimes used for σ (st), and also used as a numeral (6).

stigma-disk (stig'mä-disk'), n. In bot., a disk forming the seat of a stigma, sometimes produced by the fusion of two or more style-apices, as in Asclepias.

stigmatal (stig'mäl), a. [*< stigma*¹ + -al.] Of or pertaining to a stigma; stigmatic. Specifically applied in entomology to a vein of the wings of some insects, whose modification makes a stigma (pterostigma).

Stigmara (stig'mä-riä), n. [NL. < L. stigma, a mark (see *stigma*¹), + -aria.] A former genus of fossil plants, very abundant in many regions in the coal-measures, and especially in the under-clay, or clayey material (often mixed with more or less sand) by which most seams of coal are underlain; also [L. c.], a plant of this genus. These plants are cylindrical root-like bodies, usually starting from a center in four main branches, and afterward bifurcating irregularly, and extending sometimes to great distances. The bodies are covered with small round depressions or scars arranged in lozenge-shaped patterns, and each the point of attachment of a ribbon-shaped filament or rootlet. In some cases the stigmata have been found attached to trunks of Sinilaria, in such a position as would naturally be occupied by the roots with reference to the stem of the plant or tree; hence they have been admitted by most paleobotanists to be in fact the roots of the widely distribated - on-plant called Stigmara. Some who maintain this, however, admit that the relation of the stigmara to the plant itself was peculiar; while others believe that they were floating stems, able under favorable conditions to play the part of roots. This opinion has for its support the fact that thick beds of under-leaf are frequently found almost entirely made up of remains of stigmara, while not even a fragment of Stigmara can be found in the vicinity.

Stigmara (stig-mā'-ri-an), a. [< Stigmara + -an.] Relating to, containing, or consisting of Stigmara. Geol. Mag., No. 267, p. 407.

stigmarioid (stig-mā'-ri-oid), a. [< Stigmara + -oid.] In bot., resembling Stigmara.

stigmata, n. Latin plural of stigma.

stigmatal (stig-mā'-tal), a. [< stigmatal + -al.] In entom., pertaining to, near, or containing the stigmatal or breathing-pores; stigmatal: as, the stigmatal line of a caterpillar.

stigmatik (stig-mat'-ik, formerly also stig-mat'-ik), a. and n. [< ML. stigmatikus. < L. stigma, < Gr. στίγμα, a mark, brand: see stigma.] I. a. Of or pertaining to a stigma, in any sense of that word. Specifically—(a) Having the character of a brand; ignominious. Print in my face
The most stigmatized title of a villain.
Heywood, Woman Killed with Kindness (Works, II. 110).

(b) Marked with or as with a stigma or brand; repulsive; abhorrent.
So the world is become ill favoured and shrewd-pated, as politic in brain as it is stigmatized in limbs.
Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 19.

(c) In nat. hist., belonging to or having the character of a stigma; stigmat. Budley, Anat. Invert., p. 374. (d) In bot., receptive of pollen: said of parts of the style which have the function without the form of a stigma, as the "silk" of maize. (e) Bearing the stigmatal; stigmatized. See stigma, 5.—Stigmatic cells, in bot., same as tid-cells.

II. n. 1. A person who is marked with stigma, in the ecclesiastical or the pathological sense; a stigmatist.—2. A criminal who has been branded; one who bears upon his person the marks of infamy or punishment; a notorious profligate.
Convaide him to a justice, where one swore
He had been branded stigmatic before.
Phylomythia (1616). (Nares.)

3. One on whom nature has set a mark of deformity.
But like a foul, mis-shapen stigmatic,
Mark'd by the destinies to be avoided.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., ii. 2. 136.

flowing yeast.—3. A stand on which pottery is placed in the drying-kiln preparatory to firing. Stillingia -sti-lin'ji-ā, n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1767), named after Benjamin Stillingfleet, an English botanist who published botanical papers in 1759.] 1. A genus of apetalous plants, of the order Euphorbiacea, tribe Crotomea, and subtribe Hippomaniæ. It is characterized by monocious flowers in terminal bracted spikes, each bract bearing two glands—the male flowers having a small calyx with two or three broad shallow lobes, and two or rarely three free exerted stamens, and the female flowers bearing an ovary of two or three cells, which terminate in undivided styles united at the base, and ripen into two-valved carpels which on falling leave the receptacle armed with three hard spreading horns. There are about 13 species, natives of North and South America, the Mascarene Islands, and the islands of the Pacific. They are mostly smooth shrubs, usually with alternate short-petioled leaves and a few small female flowers solitary under the lower bracts of the dense sterile spike, which bears usually three male flowers under each of the short and broad upper bracts. One species, S. sylvatica, occurs from Virginia southward, for which see queen's-delight and silver-leaf.

2. [l. c.] A plant of the above genus, especially the official S. sylvatica.

stillion (stil'yōn), n. Same as stilling. G. Scamell, Breweries and Maltings, p. 92.

Go limping home to Christendom on stilts.
Marlowe, Jew of Malta, ii. 3. 215.

2. One of two props or poles, each having a step or stirrup at some distance from the lower end, by means of which one may walk with the feet raised from the ground, and with a longer stride: used for crossing sandy or marshy places, streams, etc., and by children for amusement. Stilts are sometimes merely props fastened under the feet, as if very high-heeled shoes. Those used by children are slender poles about 6 feet long, with steps or stirrups 12 inches or more from one end; the longer end of the pole can be held by the hand or passed behind the arm. In a modified form the upper end of the pole is much shorter, and is fitted with a cross-handle which can be grasped by the hand, or is strapped to the leg below the knee. Stilts are used by the shepherds of the marshy Landes in southwestern France.

In ceram., a support, generally of iron, used to hold a piece of pottery in the kiln, to allow the fire free access to the bottom of the piece. Also called cockspur and spur (which see).—6. [Abbrev. of stilt-bird.] In ornith., any bird of the genus Himantopus: so called from the extremely long, slender legs. The bill is likewise very slender, straight, and sharp. The body is slender, the neck long, the wings are long and pointed, and the tail is short. The stilts are wading-birds living in marshes. They are white below, with most of the upper parts glossy-black, the bill is black, and the legs are of some bright tint. They are very generally distributed over the world, nest on the ground, and lay four dark-colored, heavily spotted eggs. Their food consists of small soft animals found in the mud and water, which they explore with their probe-like bills. The common stilt of the Old World is H. candidus or melanocephalus; that of the United States is H. mexicanus, a rare bird in the eastern regions of the constimulant (stim'u-lant), a. and n. [= F. stimulant = Sp. Pg. estimulante = It. stimolante, < L. stimulan(-t)s, ppr. of stimulare, prick, urge, stimulate: see stimulate.] 1. a. Stimulating; serving to stimulate, incite, or provoke: specifically, in physiol., temporarily quickening some functional or trophic process.—stimulant balsam, a mixture of oil of turpentine 8 parts and flour mustard 1 part.

II. n. 1. That which stimulates, provokes, or incites; a stimulus; a spur.

The stimulant used to attract at first must be not only continued, but heightened to keep up the attraction.

Mrs. H. More, Catech, xxv.

2. In physiol., an agent which temporarily quickens some functional or trophic process. It may act directly on the tissue concerned, or may excite the nerves which effect the process or paralyze the nerves which inhibit it. Stimulants comprise certain medicinal substances, as ammonia, alcohol, ethylic ether, as well as physical conditions, such as warmth, cold, light, or electricity, esthetic effects, as music and other products of art, and emotions of various kinds, as joy, hope, etc. Stimulants have been divided into general and topical, according as they affect directly or indirectly the whole system or only a particular part.—Diffusible stimulants, those stimulants, as ether or ammonia, which have a speedy and quickly transient effect.

stimulate (stim'u-lät), v.; pret. and pp. stimulated, ppr. stimulating. [< L. stimulare, pp. of stimulare (> It. stimolare = Sp. Pg. estimular = F. stimuler), prick, urge, stimulate, < stimulus, a goad: see stimulus.] 1. trans. 1. To prick; goad; excite, rouse, or animate to action or more vigorous exertion by some effective motive or by persuasion; spur on; incite.

The general must stimulate the mind of his soldiers to the perception that they are men, and the enemy is no more.
Emerson, Courage.

Mystery in nature stimulates inquiry; why should it not do so in religion? J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 149.

2. In physiol., to quicken temporarily some functional or trophic process in.—3. Specifically, to affect by the use of intoxicating drinks.

We were all slightly stimulated [with arrack] before a move was made toward the dinner table.

O'Donovan, Merv, xi.

Stimulating bath, a bath containing aromatic astringent or tonic ingredients. = Syn. 1. To encourage, impel, urge, instigate, provoke, whet, foment, kindle, stir up.

Gay, To a Poor Man, l. 87.

stimulation (stim'u-lä'shon), n. [= F. stimulation = Sp. estimulación = Pg. estimulação = It. stimolazione, < L. stimulatio(n-), a pricking, incitement, < stimulare, prick, goad, stimulate: see stimulate.] 1. The act of stimulating, or the state of being stimulated; urging; encouragement; incitement; increased or quickened action or activity.

The providential stimulations and excitations of the conscience. Ep. Ward, Sermon, Jan. 30, 1674. (Latham.)

A certain length of stimulation seems demanded by the inertia of the nerve-substance.

W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 648.

2. In med., the act or method of stimulating; the condition of being stimulated; the effect of the use of stimulants.

The latent morbid predisposition [to delirium tremens] engendered in the nervous system by prolonged and abnormal stimulation is evoked or brought into activity by the depressing influence of the shock [of a corporeal injury].

J. M. Carnochan, Operative Surgery, p. 153.

= Syn. 1. See stimulate.

stimulative (stim'u-lä-tiv), a. and n. [= It. stimulativo; as stimulate + -iv.] 1. a. Having the quality of stimulating; tending to stimulate.

II. n. That which stimulates; that which rouses into more vigorous action; a stimulant or incentive.

Then there are so many stimulatives to such a spirit as mine in this affair, besides love!

Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, I. 225. (Davies.)

stimulator (stim'u-lä-tor), n. [= F. stimulateur = It. stimolatore, < L. stimulator, an instigator, < L. stimulare, prick, goad: see stimulate.] One who or that which stimulates.

stimulus (stim'u-lus), n.; pl. stimuli (-li). [= F. stimulus, stimule = Sp. estimulo = Pg. estímulo = It. stimolo, stimulo, < L. stimulus, a goad, a pointed stake, fig. a sting, pang, an incitement, spur, stimulus, < √ stig, also in instigare, set on, incite, urge, = Gr. στίξω, pierce, prick, = *AS. stecan, pierce: see stick.] 1. Literally, a goad.—2. In bot., a sting: as, the nettle is furnished with stimuli.—3. The point at the end of a crozier, pastoral staff, precentor's staff, or the like. In the staves of ecclesiastical authority the stimulus or point is regarded as the emblem of judgment or punishment.

4. Something that excites or rouses the mind or spirits; something that incites to action or exertion; an incitement or incentive.

We went to dine last Thursday with Mr. —, a neighboring clergyman, a haunch of venison being the stimulus to the invitation. Sydney Smith, in Lady Holland, vi.

The infinitely complex organizations of commerce have grown up under the stimulus of certain desires existing in each of us. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 25.

5. In physiol., something which evokes some functional or trophic reaction in the tissues on which it acts.

Light does not act as a stimulus to the nervous substance, either fibres or cells, unless it have an intensity which is nearly deadly to that substance.

G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 179.

Absolute stimulus difference, in psychophysics, the actual difference in strength between two stimuli. — Relative stimulus difference, in psychophysics, the ratio of the difference between two stimuli to their mean. — Stimulus receptivity, in psychophysics, the power of apprehending stimuli, measured by the least intensity of stimulus giving the greatest conscious effect. — Stimulus scope, in psychophysics, the difference between the measure of stimulus receptivity and the stimulus threshold. — Stimulus susceptibility, in psychophysics, the power of perceiving a stimulus, so that the greater the stimulus susceptibility the lower the stimulus threshold. — Stimulus threshold, in psychophysics, the minimum amount of stimulus required to produce a conscious effect.

Mrs. Gaskell, North and South, xxxviii.

II. intrans. 1. To have a sting; be capable of wounding with a sting; use the sting; literally or figuratively; as, hornets sting; epigrams often sting; a stinging blow.

At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder.

Prov. xlii. 32.

2. To give pain or smart; be sharply painful; smart; as, the wound stung for an hour.

Under the dust, beneath the grass,

Deep in dim death, where no thought stings,

A. C. Swinburne, Fellise.

sting¹ (sting), n. [= IE. stingi, a pin, a stitch in the side, = Sw. sting, a sting (in sense 4), = Dan. sting, stitch; from the verb.] 1. A sharp-pointed organ of certain insects and other animals, capable of inflicting by puncture a painful wound.

I bring no tales nor flatteries; in my tongue, sir,

I carry no fork'd stings. Fletcher, Loyal Subject, ii. 1.

In zool., specifically — (a) The modified ovipositor of the females of certain insects, as bees, wasps, hornets, and many other Hymenoptera; an aculeus; a terebra. This weapon is generally so constructed as to inflict a poisoned as well as punctured wound, which may become inflamed and very painful or even dangerous; an irritating fluid is injected through the tubular sting when the thrust is given. See cut under Hymenoptera. (b) The mouth-parts of various insects which are formed for piercing and sucking, as in the mosquito and other gnats or midges, gadflies, fleas, bedbugs, etc. In these cases the wound is often poisoned. See cuts under gnat and mosquito. (c) A stinging hair or spine of the larvae of various moths, or such organs collectively. See cuts under hay-moth, saddleback, and stinging. (d) The fangs of spiders, with which these creatures bite — in some cases, as of the katipo or malmignatte, inflicting a very serious or even fatal wound. See cuts under chelicera and fang. (e) The curved or claw-like telson of the tail of a scorpion, inflicting a serious poisoned wound. See cuts under scorpion and Scorpionida. (f) One of the feet or claws of centipeds, which, in the case of some of the larger kinds of tropical countries, inflict painful and dangerous wounds. (g) The poison-fang or venom-tooth of a venomous serpent; also, in popular misapprehension, the harmless soft forked tongue of any serpent. See cuts under Crotalus and forked. (h) A fin-spine of some fishes, capable of wounding. In a few cases such spines are connected with a venom gland whence poison is injected; in others, as the tail spines of sting-rays, the large bony sting, several inches long and sometimes jagged, is smeared with a substance which may cause a wound to fester. See cuts under stomach, sting ray. (i) An urticating organ, or such organs collectively, of the jellyfishes, sea-nettles, or other coelenterates. See cut under nematocyst.

2. In bot., a sort of sharp-pointed hollow hair, seated upon or connected with a gland which secretes an acrid or poisonous fluid, which, when introduced under the skin, produces a stinging pain. For plants armed with such stings, see cockspur, *nettle*¹ (with cut), nettle-tree, 2, and tread-softly. — 3. The fine taper of a dog's tail. Sportsman's Gazetteer. — 4. The operation or effect of a sting; the act of stinging; the usually poisoned punctured wound made by a sting; also, the pain or smart of such a wound.

Their softest touch as smart as lizards' stings!

Shak., 2 Ilen, VI., iii. 2. 325.

5. Anything, or that in anything, which gives acute pain, or constitutes the principal pain; also, anything which goads to action; as, the sting of hunger; the stings of remorse; the stings of reproach.

The sting of death is sin.

Come, let's in and drink a cup of stingo.

Randolph, Hey for Honesty, ii. 6.

sting-ray (sting'rā), n. [Also, corruptly, stingaree, stinguree; < *sting*¹ + *ray*².] A batoid fish of the family Trygonidae, as Trygon (or Dasybatis) pastinaca, having a long, smooth, flexible, lash-like tail armed near the base with a bony spine several inches long, sharp at the point, and serrated along the sides. It is capable of inflicting a severe and very painful wound, which appears to be poisoned by the slime with which the sting is covered. There are many species of sting-rays, in some of which there are two or three spines bundled together. The British species above named is locally known as fire-flare or fiery-flare. The commonest sting-ray of the North Atlantic coast of the United States is T. centroura, locally known as cham cracker, and corruptly called stingaree.

T. sabina is a similar southern species. The name extends to any ray with a tail-spine. See Myliobatidae (a).

stingtail (sting'tāl), n. A sting-ray.

sting-winkle (sting'wing-kl), n. The hedgehog-murex, Murex ermarcus or europanus; so called by fishermen because it bores holes in other shell-fish, as if stinging them.

stingy¹ (sting'i), a. [*< sting*¹ + -y.] Stingy; piercing, as the wind; sharp, as a criticism. [Colloq. or prov. Eng.] stingy² (stin'ji), a. [A dialectal (assibilated) form and deflected use of *stingy*¹.] 1. Ill-tempered. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.] — 2. Meanly avaricious; extremely close-fisted and covetous; niggardly; as, a stingy fellow.

Southern Sting ray, Trygon centroura, from Report of U. S. Fish Commission.

The gripping and stingy humour of the covetous.

Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. vii.

3. Scanty; not full or plentiful.

When your teams

Drag home the stingy harvest.

Longfellow, Wayside Inn, Birds of Killingworth.

= Syn. 2. Parsimonious, Miserly, etc. (see penurious), illiberal, ungenerous, saving, chary.

stink (stingk), v.: pret. and pp. stunk (pret. formerly stank), pp. stinking. [< ME. stinken, stynken (pret. stank, stonk, pp. stonken). < AS. stincan (pret. stanc, pp. stancen), smell, have an odor, rise as vapor. = MD. D. stinken = MLG. LG. stinken = OHG. stincan, smell, have an odor, MHG. G. stinken = Sw. stinka = Dan. stinke, have a bad smell, stink; cf. Gr. ταῖνος, rancid. Perhaps connected with Icel. stökkra, spring, leap, sprinkle, but not with Goth. stiggk-wan, smite, thrust, strike; cf. L. tangere, touch (see tact, tangent). Hence ult. stinch! I. intrans. To emit a strong offensive smell; send out a disgusting odor; hence, to be in bad odor; have a bad reputation; be regarded with disfavor.

And therewithal he stank so horribel.

Chaucer, Monk's Tale, I. 627.

Fall Fate upon us,

Our memories shall never stink behind us.

Fletcher, Humorous Lieutenant, iii. 7.

Stinking badger, the stinkard or teledu.—Stinking bunt. Same as stinking smut.—Stinking camomile. Same as mayweed.—Stinking cedar, a coniferous tree of the genus Torreya; so named from the strong peculiar odor of the wood and foliage, especially when bruised or burnt. Most properly so called is T. taxifolia, an extremely large tree of western Florida, an evergreen of moderate size, with bright-yellow (or in old trees reddish) wood susceptible of a fine polish, very durable in contact with the soil, and, where found, largely used for fence posts. Also called savin. See cut under Torreya. The similar T. californica is the California nutmeg (see nutmeg). T. grandis of China, called kaya, affords a good timber. T. nucifera, a smaller Japanese species, yields a wood valued by coopers and turners, and a food-oil is expressed from its nuts. Also stinking yew.—Stinking crane's-bill. Same as herb-robert.—Stinking goose-foot. Same as notched.—Stinking hellebore, hoarhound. See the nouns.—Stinking mayweed, the common mayweed.—Stinking nightshade. Same as henbane.—Stinking nutmeg, the California nutmeg, one of the stinking cedars. See nutmeg.—Stinking smut. See smut, 3.—Stinking vervain, the guinea hen weed. See Petiveria.—Stinking yew. Same as stinking cedar.

II. trans. To annoy with an offensive smell; affect in any way by an offensive odor. Imp. Diet.

stink (stingk), n. [< ME. stinke, styuk, styuke; from the verb. Cf. stench!]. 1. A strong offensive smell; a disgusting odor; a stench.

And fro him cometh out Smoke and Stynk and Fuyr, and so moche Abhominacion that unthe no man may there endure.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 282.

In Kolu, a town of monks and bones,
And pavements fanged with murderous stones,
And rags, and hags, and hideous wenches —
I counted two and seventy stenchs,
All well-defined and several stinks!

Coleridge, Cologne.

Stinkpot (Cinosternum odoratum or Aromochelys odorata).

of turtle common in some parts of the United States. It is a common inhabitant of the eastern and central streams of the country, and is very troublesome to fishermen by swallowing their bait. It is useful as a scavenger.

stink-rat (stingk'rat), n. The musk-turtle. See stinkpot, 4. [Local, U. S.] stink-shad (stingk'shad), n. Same as mud-shad.

stinkstone (stingk'stôn), n. A variety of limestone which gives off a fetid odor when quarried or struck by a hammer. This odor comes from the escape of sulphureted hydrogen, and in most cases it seems to be caused by the decomposition of embedded organic matter. In some quarries in the Carboniferous limestone of Ireland the smell has been found so overpowering that the men were sickened by it, and had to leave off work for a time. (Jukes.) Also called fetid limestone, and seine-stone.

stink-trap (stingk'trap), n. A contrivance to prevent the escape of effluvia from the openings of drains; a stench-trap.

stink-turtle (stingk'tér'tl), n. The musk-turtle. See stinkpot, 4.

stinkweed (stingk'wéd), n. 1. An ill-smelling cruciferous plant, Diplataris muralis, of southern Europe. [Prov. Eng.].—2. The jimson-weed.

stinkwood (stingk'wúd), n. One of several trees with fetid wood. (a) In South Africa, Ocotea bullata (see Ocotea) and Celtis Kraussiana, the latter a tree 20 feet high and 2 feet in diameter, with a tough yellowish-white wood used for planks, cooperage, etc. (b) In Tasmania, a shrub or tree, Zieria Smithii, also found in Australia, and sometimes called sand-fly bush. (c) In the Mascarene Islands, Portulaca Mauritanica of the Martacea, a tree from 20 to 40 feet high, whose wood is used for foundations, not being attacked by white ants.

stint (stint), v. [Also obs. or dial. stent; < ME. stinten, stynten, stenten, < AS. styntan, make dull, blunt, orig. make short (also in comp. forstyntan, ge-stentan, warn, restrain) (= Icel. styta (for 'stypta), shorten) = Sw. dial. stypta, shorten, = Norw. stytta, stutta, shorten, tuck up the clothes), < stund, dull, obtuse, stupid, = Icel. stuttr = OSw. stunt = Norw. stutt, short: see stunt.] I. trans. 1. The kynges were stynted at the entre of the forest by a river, and ther assembled alle her peple that thei myght have.

Merlin (E. F. T. S.), ii. 154.

3. To forbear; cease.

Art thou a scrining man? then serue againe,

And stint to steale as common souldiours do.

Gascoigne, Steele Glas (ed. Arber), p. 67.

Spare not to spur, nor stint to ride,

Until thou come to fair Tweedside.

Scott, L. of L. M., I. 22.

4. To limit; restrain; restrict; hence, to limit or confine to a scanty allowance; as, to stint one's self in food; to stint service or help.

[He] travels halfe a day without any refreshment then water, whereof wisely and temperately he stinted himselfe.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, II. 135.

Was the infinite One to be confined to this narrow space? Could His love be stinted to the few to whom He had especially revealed His Will? Channing, Perfect Life, p. 61.

5. To assign a definite task to; prescribe a specified amount of labor for; as, to stint a pupil or a servant. See stint, n., 2.—6. To cover or serve (a mare) successfully; get with foal. See the quotation under stinted, 2.

II. intrans. 1. To cease; desist; stay; stop; hold.

It's in things for shew they ent short; while for such as me, it's in things for life we've to stint.

Mrs. Gaskell, Mary Barton, xxxvii.

stint (stint), n. [Also obs. or dial. stent; < stint, v.] 1. Limit; bound; limitation; restriction; restraint; as, common without stint (that is, without limitation or restriction as to the extent of the pasturage, the number of cattle to be pastured, or the period of the year).

If the summe which the debter oweth he above the stint, he shall not be released. Coryat, Crudities, I. 167.

I know not how, Divine Providence seemeth to haue set those Scythian stints to the Persian proceedings.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 352.

By rallying round the throne the whole strength of the Royalists and High-Churchmen, and by using without stint all the resources of corruption, he [Danby] flattered himself that he could manage the Parliament.

Macaulay, Sir W. Temple.

2. Fixed amount or quantity; allowance; prescribed or allotted task or performance; as, a certain stint of work.

Put me to a certain stint, sir; allow me but a red her-ring a-day. Fletcher (and another), Love's Cure, ii. 1.

In the divided or social state, these functions are parcelled out to individuals, each of whom aims to do his stint of the joint work.

Emerson, Misc., p. 72.

Margaret had a new stint at quilting.

S. Judd, Margaret, i. 2.

If you are sick or weak, and can't finish your stint, you are given twenty blows with the cat.

The Century, XXXVII. 36.

3. One of several small species of sandpiper, especially of the genus Actodromas; a sandpeep. The common stint is the dunlin, purre, or ox-bird, Pelidna alpina. (See dunlin.) This is an early, if not the first, application of the name, as by Ray, who called this bird also ozeys and least snipe. The little stint is Actodromas minutilla; the least stint is A. minutilla, which abounds in North America, and is also known as Wilson's sandpiper. Temminck's stint is A. temminckii; the red-necked, A. ruficollis. There are several others of the same genus. The broad-billed sandpiper, Limicola platyrhynchos, is a kind of stint, and the spoon-billed, Euryorchichus pygmaeus, is another. Extension of the name to the sanderling and to phalaropes is unusual.

stintance (stin'tans), n. [< stint + -ance.] Stint; limit; restriction; restraint. London Prodigal, p. 7. (Halliwell.) [Rare.]

stinted (stin'ted), p. a. 1. Limited; scanty; sermiped.

Oh! trille not with wants you cannot feel,
Nor mock the misery of a stinted meal.

Crabbe, Works, I. 9.

2. In foal. See stint, v. t., 6. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

Stinted, 'in foal.' The word was printed, in this sense, in a catalogue of live-stock for sale at Nashville a year or two ago [1894]. Halliwell and Wright give it as an adjective, meaning in foal, used in the West of England.

Trans. Amer. Philol. Ass., XVII. 41.

stintedness (stin'ted-nes), n. The character or condition of being stinted.

stinter (stin'ter), n. [< stint + -er.] One who or that which stints, checks, or puts a stop to: as, a stinter of strife.

Let us now see whether a set form, or this extemporary way, be the greater hinderer and stinter of it.

South, Sermons, II. iii.

stintingly (stin'ting-li), adv. Restrictedly; restrainedly; grudgingly. George Eliot, Janet's Repentance, viii.

stintless (stin'tles), a. [< stint + -less.] 1. Ceaseless.

He gets glimpses of the same stintless hospitality.

The Century, XXVII. 201.

stinty (stin'ti), a. [< stint + -y.] Restricted; grudging; illiberal. [Rare.]

Those endowments which our Anglo-Saxon forefathers made to win for themselves and kindred such ghostly aids in another world were neither few nor stinty.

Rock, Church of our Fathers, ii. 327.

stiony, n. See stony.

Stipa (stī'pā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1753), named from the flaxen appearance of the feathery awns of S. pennata; < L. stipa, stupa, stappa, the coarse part of flax, tow; see stupa.] A genus of grasses, of the tribe Agrostideae, type of the subtribe Stipeae. It is characterized by one-flowered panicle spikelets, with their pedicels not continued beyond the flower, which contains three or perhaps sometimes only two lodicules and a narrow acuminate flowering glume indurated closely around the grain and prolonged, usually by a joint into a long and commonly conspicuously twisted or bent awn. There are nearly 100 species, widely dispersed through both tropical and temperate regions. They are tufted grasses, usually tall, with convolute leaves and a slender, sparingly branched panicle of rather long scattered spikelets, with awns sometimes extremely attenuated. A general name of the species is feather-grass, applying particularly to the highly ornamental S. pennata of Europe. The only common species of the eastern United States is S. arenacea, the black oat-grass; westward the species are numerous—several, known as bunch, beard, or feather-grass, being somewhat valuable wild forage-plants of the mountains and great plains. Among these are S. comata (silk-grass) and S. spartea (porcupine-grass), the latter remarkable for its hygrometric awns, which are coiled when dry, but uncoil under moisture and, when resisted, tend to push the seed into the ground. S. viridula, var. robusta, of Mexico, New Mexico, etc., is reported to have a narcotic effect upon horses, and is called sleepy-grass. S. aristiglumis of Australia is a valuable fodder-plant, of remarkably rapid growth; S. micrantha of Queensland borrows the name of bambusa. S. tenacissima and S. arenaria, on account of their large membranous spikelets and two-cleft flowering glume, are sometimes separated as a genus, Macrochloa (Kunth, 1835). See esparto, alfa, and atocha-grass.

stipate (stī'pāt), a. [< L. stipatus, pp. of stipare, crowd, press together. Cf. constipate.] In bot., crowded.

stipe¹ (stīp), n. [A dial. var. of *steep*¹. Cf. Stiper Stone group.] A steep ascent. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

stipe² (stīp), n. [< F. stipe, a stipe, = Sp. estipite, a door-post, = It. stipite, a stock, trunk, post, door-post, < L. stipēs (stipit-), a stock, trunk, post, poet. a tree, a branch of a tree; perhaps cognate with E. stiff.] 1. In bot., a stalk or support of some sort, the word being variously employed. (a) In flowering plants, the stalk formed by the receptacle or some part of it, or by a carpel. To distinguish further this kind of stipe, various other terms are employed, as thecophore, gonophore, anthophore, gynophore, and carpophore. See cut under Arachis. (b) The stalk or petiole of a frond, especially of a fern or seaweed. See cut under seaweed. (c) In fungi, especially of the genus Agaricus, the stalk or stem which supports the pileus or cap. (d) The caudex of a tree-fern. Also stipes. See cut in next column.

Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, [ed. Arber, p. 134].

'Twas a wonder with how small a stipend from his father Tom Tusher contrived to make a good figure.

Thackeray, Henry Esmond, x.

=Syn. Pay, etc. See salary.

stipend (stī'pend), v. t. [< F. stipendier = Sp. Pg. estipendiar = It. stipendiare, pay, hire, < L. stipendiari, receive pay, serve for pay, < stipendium, pay; see stipend, n.] To pay by settled stipend or wages; put upon or provide with a stipend. Shelton, tr. of Don Quixote, xlvii. (Latham.) [Rare.]

stipendiarian (stī-pen-di-ā-ri-an), a. [< stipendiarius + -an.] Acting from mercenary considerations; hired; stipendiary. Imp. Dict.

stipendiary (stī-pen-di-ā-ri), a. and n. [< F. stipendiare = Sp. Pg. estipendiar = It. stipendiario, < L. stipendiarius, pertaining to tribute, contribution, or pay, < stipendium, tribute, pay; see stipend.] 1. A. Receiving wages or salary; performing services for a stated price or compensation; paid. — Stipendiary curate. See curate.

— Stipendiary estate, in law, a fief or estate granted in return for services, generally of a military kind. — Stipendiary magistrate, in Great Britain, a police justice sitting in large cities and towns, under appointment by the Home Secretary on behalf of the crown.

II. n.; pl. stipendiaries (-riz). 1. One who performs services for a settled payment, salary, or stipend. — 2. A stipendiary magistrate. See under I. — 3. In law, a feudatory owing services to his lord.

stipendiater (stī-pen-di-āt), v. t. [< L. stipendiatum, pp. of stipendiari, receive pay, serve for pay, < stipendium, tribute, salary; see stipend, v.] To endow with a stipend or salary.

Besides, ye exercise of the horse, armies, dancing, &c., all the sciences are taught in the vulgar French by professors stipendiati by the great Cardinal.

Evelyn, Diary, Sept. 14, 1644.

Stiper Stone group. [< Stiper Stones (see def. v.).] In geol., a subgroup, the equivalent of the Arenig series in Carnarvonshire; so called from the name Stiper Stones given to a prominent ridge of quartzose rocks rising above the moorland in Shropshire, and extending for about ten miles in length. The Arenig or Stiper Stone group, according to Murchison's original classification (1837), formed the base of the Silurian system. It is now considered to be the base of Lapworth's Ordovician, of the Cambro-Silurian of Jukes, and of the Middle Cambrian of other English geologists.

stipes (stī'pēz), n. [NL. < L. stipēs, stips (stipit-), a stock, trunk; see *stipe*².] 1. In bot., same as *stipe*². — 2. In zool., a stalk or stem, as an eye-stalk or a footstalk; a stipe. Specifically — (a) In entom., the footstalk of the maxilla of an insect, the outer or main division of that organ; the second joint of the maxilla, borne upon the cardo, and through the palpal and subgaleal bearing the palpus, galea, and lacinia, when these organs exist. Also called shaft. See cut under galea and Insecta. (b) In Myriapoda: (1) The proximal or median one of two pieces of which the protomala, or so-called mandible, consists, the other being the cardo. See protomala, and figure under epilabrum. (2) One of two sets, an inner and an outer, of broad plates into which the dentomala, or second pair of mouth-appendages, of a myriapod is divided. See dentomala. A. S. Packard, Proc. Amer. Philos. Soc., June, 1883, pp. 198, 200.

stipiform (stī'pī-fōrm), a. [< L. stipis, stips (stipit-), a stock, trunk, + forma, form.] In bot. and zool., having the form or appearance of a stipe or stipes. See *stipe*², stips.

stipitate (stī'pī-tāt), a. [*< NL. stipitatus, < L. stipēs (stipit-), a stock, trunk; see *stipe*².] In bot. and zool., having or supported by a stipe or stipes; elevated on a stipe.

stipitiform (stī'pī-tī-fōrm), a. [< L. stipis (stipit-), a stock, trunk (see *stipe*²), + forma, form.] In bot. and zool., having the form or character of a stipe or stipes; stipiform; stalk-like.

stipiture (stī'pī-tūr), n. A bird of the genus Stipiturus; an emu-wren.

Stipiturus (stī'pī-tū-rus), n. [NL. (Lesson, 1831). < L. stipis (stipit-), a stock, trunk, + Gr. oipa, tail.] An Australian genus of warbler-like birds, assigned to the Mularina or placed elsewhere, having the tail curiously formed of ten feathers with stiffened shafts and loose decomposed barbs (whence the name); the emu-wren.

Emu-wren (Stipiturus malurus).

S. malurus is a small brownish bird streaked with black, and with a blue throat, described by Latham in 1801 as the sooty-tailed flycatcher. The immediate affinities of the genus are with such forms as Sphenocercus and Sphenura (see these words) and the true position of all these forms seems to be among or near the reed- or grass-warblers, especially such as have but ten tail-feathers. See warbler.

stipple (stī'pl), v. t.: pret. and pp. stippled, pp. stippling. [< D. stipplen, speckle, dot over (cf. stippl, a speckle, dim. of stip, a point), freq. of stippen (> G. stippen), prick, dot, speckle, < stip, MD. stip, stip, a point, dot.] To produce gradation in color or shade in (any material) by means of dots or small spots. The act of stipulating, agreeing, or covenanting; a contracting or bargaining. —2. That which is stipulated or agreed upon; a contract or bargain, or a particular article or item in a contract: as, the stipulations of the allied powers to furnish each his contingent of troops; a contract containing so many stipulations. —3. In law, specifically—(a) An agreement between counsel or attorneys in a cause, affecting its conduct. (b) An undertaking in the nature of bail taken in the admiralty courts. (c) In Roman law, a contract in which the form consisted in a question and answer, formalities which in course of time came to be recognized as making a valid contract which might dispense with the ceremonials required by the earlier law.

stipulation² (stip'ū-lā'shun), n. [< L. stipula, a stalk: see stipule.] In bot., the situation and structure of the stipules.

stipulator (stip'ū-lā-tor), n. [< L. stipulator, one who stipulates, < stipulari, demand a formal promise, bargain, stipulate: see stipulate.] One who stipulates, contracts, or covenants; in Rom. law, one to whom a stipulation or promise was given in the form of contract known as stipulatio. See *stipulation*¹, 3 (c).

stipule (stip'ūl), n. [= F. stipule = It. stipula, < L. stipula, a stalk, stem, blade, dim. of stipes, stock, trunk: see stipe.] 1. In bot.: (a) One of a pair of lateral appendages found at the base of the petiole of many leaves. Stipules are normally flat organs, leaf-like in appearance and use, or colorless and scale-like, and without function—sometimes, however, as in the magnolia, fig, and beech, serving as bud-scales and falling when the leaves expand. Stipules may be free from the petiole, or adnate by one edge, then passing by grades into mere wing-like expansions of its base; they may be free from one another, or variously united, sometimes so as to clasp the stem, sometimes between it and the leafstalk (then intrapetiole), sometimes sheathing the stem, as in Polypodium, then forming a crenate (see crenate). The adjacent members of two opposite pairs may become connate around the stem, as in many Rubiaceæ. Stipules are sometimes reduced to mere bristles, or take the form of spines, as in the common locust; in Santalum they appear to be converted into tendrils. They are often wholly wanting, but where present they generally characterize whole families, as they do the Malvaceæ, Leguminosæ, and Rosaceæ. (b) In the Characeæ, one of certain unicellular tubes, of greater or less length, on the inner and outer sides of the so-called leaf. (c) Same as paraphyllum (b). —2. In ornith., a newly sprouted feather; a pin-feather. Also stipula.

stipuled (stip'ūld), a. [< stipule + -ed.] In bot., furnished with stipules, or lateral leafy appendages.

stipuliform (stip'ū-lī-fōrm), a. [< L. stipula, a stalk, + forma, form.] In bot., having the form of a stipule.

stir¹ (stēr), v.; pret. and pp. stirred, ppr. stirring. [Also dial. steer (and stoor); early mod. E. also stirr, stirre, stire, stere; < ME. stiren, stercen, sturen, stycen, < AS. styrian, move, stir, = North Fries. stiaren = MD. stooren, D. stören, disturb, vex, = MLG. stören, disturb, hinder, = OHG. stören, stören, scatter, destroy, disturb, MHG. stören, G. stören, disturb, interrupt, hinder, = Sw. störa, disturb: cf. leel. styrr, a stir, Dan. for-styrr, disturb; not connected with L. sternere, scatter, or E. strew: see strew.] (f. stoor.) stirrup (stīr' or stēr'up), n. [Early mod. E. also stirrop, stirap, sterep; < ME. stīrap, stīrop, stīrope, stīrepe, < AS. stīrāp, stīgrāp, stīgrāp (= MD. stegerēp, steehrecp, also steghrecp = OIG. stegareif, MHG. G. stegreif = led. stap-reip, lit. 'mounting-rope.' < stīgan, mount, + rāp, rope: see stīl and ropel. Cf. D. stīg-buigel = G. stīg-bügel = Sw. stīg-bygel = Dan. stīg-bøjle, a stirrup, lit. a ring or loop for mounting (see baul).] 1. A support for the foot of a person mounted on a horse, usually a metal loop with the bottom part flat and corrugated or finished with points to give a hold to the sole of the boot and to aid in mounting. The metal loop is suspended from the saddle by a strap or thong, which in modern saddles is adjustable in length. The stirrup of Arab or other Eastern horsemen has a very broad rest for the foot; this projects sometimes beyond the heel, and the sharp edge of it serves instead of a spur. The stirrups of some modern military saddles have a strong front piece of leather or other material which prevents the foot from passing too far into the loop and protects the front of the leg. See also cut under saddle.

1. Stirrup for poulaine; 2. modern stirrup; 3. Mexican wooden stirrup; 4. Mexican wooden stirrup with taps.

Our hosts upon his stirropes stood anon.

Chaucer, Prologue to Shipman's Tale, l. 1.

I'll hold your stirrup when you do alight,
And without grudging wait till you return.

Beau. and Fl., Honest Man's Fortune, iv. 1.

2. Naut., a rope with an eye at its end, through which a foot-rope is rove, and by which it is supported. The ends of stirrups are securely fastened to the yard, and they steady the men when reeling or furling sails.

3. In mach., any piece resembling in shape and functions the stirrup of a saddle, as the iron loop by which a mill-saw hangs from the muley-head or in the sash.—4. In carp., etc., an iron loop-strap or other device for securing a rafter-post or strut to a tie, or for supporting a beam, etc.—5. A hold for the foot at the end of the stock of a large crossbow, to keep it firm while the bow is bent and the string drawn to the notch. See cut under archalister.

—6. In anat., the stapes or stirrup-bone.

stirrup-bar (stīr'up-bār), n. The spring-bar or other device on a riding-saddle to which the upper end of the stirrup-strap is fastened.

stirrup-piece (stīr'up-pēs), n. In carp., mach., etc., anything which performs the office of a stirrup, in hanging from a fixed point of support and supporting anything else which lies in its loop or hollow.

stirtet, stirtt. Obsolete forms of the preterit and past participle of start.

stitch (stīch), n. [ME. stiche, stycher, < AS. stīce, a pricking sensation (also in comp. instīce, an inward stitch, fār-stīce, a sudden stitch or twinge, stīc-āll, stīc-wace, stitch in the side), not found in lit. sense 'pricking,' 'piercing,' = OFries. stīke, stīk = OIG. stīh, MHG. G. stīch, a pricking, prick, sting, stab, stitch, = Goth. stīks, a point of time; from the verb, AS. stecan*, etc., prick, sting, stick; see *stick*¹, *stick*².] 1. An acute sudden pain like that produced by the thrust of a needle; a sharp spasmodic pain, especially in the intercostal muscles; as, a stitch in the side. Such pains in the side may be myalgic, neuralgic, pleuritic, or due to muscular cramp.

'Twas but a stitch into my side,

And sair it troubles me.

The Queen's Marie (Child's Ballads, III. 117).

Corporal sickness is a perpetual monitor to the conscience, every pang a reproach, and every stitch reads a lesson of mortality. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 441.

2t. A contortion; a grimace; a twist of the face.

If you talk,

Or pull your face into a stitch again,

As I love truth, I shall be very angry.

Beau. and Fl., Captain, ii. 2.

3. In sewing: (a) One movement of a threaded needle, passing in and out of the fabric, and uniting two parts by the thread, which is drawn tight after each insertion. (b) The part of the thread left in the fabric by this movement.—4. In knitting, netting, crochet, embroidery, lace-making, etc.: (a) One whole movement of the implement or implements used, as knitting-needles, bobbins, hook, etc. (b) The result of this movement, shown in the work itself.—5. The kind or style of work produced by stitching: as, buttonhole-stitch; cross-stitch; pillow-lace stitch; by extension, a kind or style of work with the loom. For stitches in lace, see *point*¹. See also whip-stitch.—6t. Distance passed over at one time; stretch; distance; way.

How far have ye come to-day? So they said, From the house of Gaius our friend. I promise you said he, you have gone a good stitch; you may well be weary, sit down. Ruydan, Pilgrim's Progress, p. 314.

7. In agri., a space between two double furrows in plowed ground; a furrow or ridge.

And many men at plough he made, that drove earth here and there.

And turn'd up stitches orderly. Chapman, Iliad, xviii. 495.

8. A bit of clothing; a rag; as, he had not a dry stitch on. [Colloq.].—9. In bookbind- ing, a connection of leaves or pieces of paper, through perforations an inch or so apart, with thread or wire. A single stitch is made with two perforations only, the thread being tied near the entering place of the stitching-needle. A double stitch has three and sometimes four perforations, the thread being reversed in and out on the upper and under side at each perforation. A saddle-back stitch has its perforations in the center of the creased folded double leaves. A side-stitch has perforations through the sides of the leaves, about one-eighth of an inch from the back fold. A French stitch has two perforations only in each section of the pamphlet, the second perforation of the first section ending where the first perforation of the second section begins, in which diagonal line the stitching-needle is put through each succeeding section, and is then reversed and locked at the end. A machine stitch is a succession of ordinary locked stitches made by the sewing machine. A wire stitch has short staples of turned wire, which are forced through the leaves and clamped by one operation of the wire-stitching machine. See kettle-stitch.—Blind stitch. See blind.—Damask stitch. See damask.—Dotted stitch. Same as dot-stitch.—False stitch, in pillow-lace making, same as false pinhole (which see, under pinhole).—Fancy, Flemish, German, glovers', gobelin, herring-bone, honeycomb, idiot, Irish, overcast stitch. stochastic (stō-kas'tik), a. [Gr. στοχαστικός, able to hit or to guess, conjecturing, < στοχάζεσθαι, aim at, endeavor after, < στοχος, aim, shot, guess.] Conjectural; given to or partaking of conjecture.

Though he [Sir T. Browne] were no prophet, . . . yet in that faculty which comes nearest to it he excelled, i. e. the stochastic, wherein he was seldom mistaken as to future events, as well public as private.

Whitefoot, quoted in Sir T. Browne's Works, I. xlvii.

stock¹ (stok), n. and a. [M.E. stocke, stokke, stok, stake, stoc (pl. stokkes, the stocks), < A.S. stoc, stocce (stoc'-), a post, trunk, stock, = O.Fries. stok = M.D. stock, D. stok = M.H.G. stok, L.G. stock = O.H.G. stoc, stoch, M.H.G. stoc (> It. stocco, a rapier), G. stock = Icel. stokkr = Dan. stok = Sw. stock (not recorded in Goth.), a post, stock (hence, from Teut., O.F. estoc, a stock, trunk of a tree, race, etc., = It. stocco, a stock, trunk of a tree, rapier, etc.; see stocco, stockade, *stock*², *tuck*², etc.); generally supposed to be connected with the similar words, of similar sense, *stick*³, *stake*¹, and so with stuck; but the phonetic connection is not clear. Assuming the sense 'stick' or 'club' to be original, a connection may be surmised with Skt. √ tuj (orig. stug*?), thrust. The senses of this noun are numerous and complicated; the M.E. senses are in part due to the O.F. estoc.] I. n. 1. A wooden post; a stake; a stump.

The Cross of our Lord was made of 4 manere of Trees, . . . and the Stock, that stode within the Erthe, . . . was of Cedre.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 10.

Lay this runde plate upon an evene grond or on an evene ston or on an evene stok fix in the gronde.
Chaucer, Astrolabe, ii. 38.

They all went downward, fleetly and guily downward, and only he, it seemed, remained behind, like a stock upon the wayside.
R. L. Stevenson, Will o' the Mill.

2. A wooden block; a block; a log; hence, something lifeless and senseless.

He swore hire yis, by stokkes and by stones,
 And by the goddes that in hevenc dwelle.
Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 589.

There was an exe, and a stoke, and oon of the lewdeste of the shippe badde hym ley down his hedde, and he should be fair ferd wyth, and dye on a swerd.
Paston Letters, I. 125.

More than dead stocks would startle at such beauty.
Chapman, Blind Beggar of Alexandria.

And those made thee forsake thy God,
 And worship stocks and stones.
Warton, Wife of Bath (Child's Ballads, VIII. 155).

3. A person who is as dull and senseless as a block or a log.

Let's be no stoics nor no stocks.
Shak., T. of the S., i. 1. 31.
 Such a stock of a child, such a statue! Why, he has no kind of feeling either of body or mind.

Brooke, Fool of Quality, iii.

What a phlegmatic sot it is! Why, sirrah, you'r an anchorite!—a vile insensible stock.
Sheridan, Rivals, iii. 1.

4. A dull object or recipient of action or notice, as of wonder, scorn, or laughter; a butt; generally the second element in a compound: as, a gazing-stock; a laughing-stock.

Howsoever we are all accounted dull, and common jesting stocks for your gallants, there are some of us do not deserve it.
Beau. and FL., Woman-Hater, iii. 3.

Thou art the stock of men, and I admire thee.
Fletcher, Rule a Wife, iii. 5.

I know, and may presume her such,
 As, out of humour, will return no love;
 And therefore might indifferently be made
 The courting-stock for all to practise on.
R. Jonson, New Inn, i. 1.

5. The stalk, stem, or trunk of a tree or other plant; the main body, or fixed and firm part.

Though the root thereof was old in the earth, and the stock thereof die in the ground.
Job xiv. 8.

There, in the stocks of trees, white faies do dwell.
R. Jonson, Sad Shepherd, ii. 2.

You know him—old, but full
 Of force and cholere, and firm upon his feet,
 And like an oaken stock in winter woods.
Tennyson, Golden Year.

6. A stem in which a graft is inserted, and which is its support; also, a stem, tree, or plant that furnishes slips or cuttings.

You see, sweet maid, we marry
 A gentler scion to the wildest stock.
Shak., W. T., iv. 4. 93.

The scion ever over-ruleth the stock.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., Int. to § 477.

Hence—7. The original progenitor of a family or race; the person from whom any given line of descent or inheritance is derived. See stock of descent, below.

This firste stok was ful of rightwisnesse,
 Trewe of his word, sobre, pitous, and free.
Chaucer, Gentillesse, l. 8.

Brave soldier, yield, thou stock of arms and honour.
Fletcher, Bonduca, v. 5.

8. Direct line of descent; race; lineage; family; as, children of the stock of Abraham.

What things are these! I shall marry into a fine stock!
Brome, Northern Lass, ii. 2.

In his actions and sentiments he belied not the stock to which he pretended.
Laurel, Two Races of Men.

They sprang from different stocks. They spoke different languages.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

9. The principal supporting or holding part; the part in which other parts are inserted, or to which they are attached in order to furnish a firm support or hold. Specifically—(a) The wooden support to which the barrel and lock of a rifle or like firearm are attached, or upon which the bow of the crossbow is mounted. See cuts under gun and gun carriage. (b) The handle by which a boring-lap is held and turned; a bit-stock; a brace. See cut under brace. (c) The block of wood which constitutes the body of a plane, and in which the cutting iron is fitted. See cuts under plane, rounding-plane, and router. (d) The support of the block on which an anvil is fitted, or of the anvil itself. (e) The crosspiece of an anchor, perpendicular to the shank, formerly of wood, when the shank was passed through a hole cut in the stock, or the latter was made in two parts toggled to receive the shank; now usually of iron, in which case the stock slips through a hole made in the shank. See cut under anchor. (f) An adjustable wrench for holding screw-cutting dies. (g) That part of a plow to which the handles, irons, etc., are attached. (h) A beater, as used in a fulling-mill, in the manufacture of chamois-leather, etc. (i) An arm of a bevel-gage or of a square. (j) The wooden frame in which the wheel and post of a spinning-wheel are supported.

10. A stiff band of horsehair, leather, or the like, covered with black satin, caubric, or similar material, and made to imitate and replace the cravat or neckband; formerly worn by men generally, and, in some forms, still in military use. It was sometimes fastened behind with a buckle, which was often an ornamental object.

A shining stock of black leather supporting his chin.
Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 321.

He wore a magnificent stock, with a liberal kind of knot in the front; in this he stuck a great pin.
W. Besant, Fifty Years Ago, p. 98.

11. The front part, especially the front side-piece, of a bed. [Scotch.]

I winna lie in your bed,
 Either at stock or wa'.
Capt. Wedderburn's Courtship (Child's Ballads, VIII. 12).

12. pl. An apparatus for the confinement of vagrants and petty offenders, formerly in use in different parts of Europe, and retained until recently in country villages in England. It consisted of two heavy timbers, one of which could be raised, and when lowered was held in place by a padlock or the like; notches in these timbers, forming round holes when the upper timber was shut down in place, held firmly the legs of those upon whom this punishment was inflicted. In some cases a second row of openings could be used to restrain the hands, and even the neck, also. Compare pillory.

This yere was ordeyned in every ward of [of London] a peyr stocks.
Arnold's Chronicle, p. xxxvi.

Mars got drunk in the town, and broke his landlord's head, for which he sat in the stocks the whole evening.
Steele, Tatler, No. 4.

13. The frame or timbers on which a ship rests while building; hence, generally, on the stocks, in course of construction or preparation.—

 14. That part of the tally which the creditor took away as evidence of the king's debt, the part retained in the Exchequer being called the counterstock. See tally.

It was the custom when money was borrowed for State purposes to record the transaction by means of notches on a stick (commonly hazel), and then to split the stick through the notches. The lender took one half as a proof of his claim against the Exchequer, and it was called his Stock. The Exchequer kept the other half which was called the counterstock, and which answered the same purpose as was served in after-times by the counterfoil.

Bitoll, Counting-House Dict., p. 200.

15. In finance: (a) The money represented by this tally; money lent to a government, or a fund consisting of a capital debt due by a government to individual holders who receive a fixed rate of interest. In modern usage, especially in Great Britain, the name is applied to a capital of which payment cannot be claimed, but on which interest is paid in perpetuity at a given rate; hence, to buy stock is simply to buy the right to this interest on a certain amount of this capital debt—a right which may be sold again. The various kinds of stocks are called the public funds. See fund, u., 2.

I have known a Captain rise to a Colonel in two days by the fall of stocks.
Steele, quoted in Ashton's Reign of Queen Anne, II. 206.

The term Stock was originally applied to the material sign and proof of money lent. But as the thing signified was of greater importance to both parties than the sign, it was at length transferred to the money itself, or rather to the right to claim it. In this way Stock came to be understood as money lent to the government, and eventually to any public body whatever.

Bitoll, Counting-House Dict., p. 200.

(b) The share capital of a corporation or commercial company; the fund employed in the carrying on of some business or enterprise, divided into shares of equal amount, and owned by individuals who jointly form a corporation; in the plural, shares; as, bank stock; railway stock; stocks and bonds.—16. The property which a merchant, a tradesman, or a company has invested in any business, including merchandise, money, and credits; more particularly, the goods which a merchant or a commercial house keeps on hand for the supply of customers.

Who trades without a stock has naught to fear.
Cibber.

"We must renew our stock, Cousin Hepzibah!" cried the little saleswoman. "The gingerbread figures are all gone, and so are those Dutch wooden milkmaids, and most of our other playthings."

Hawthorne, Seven Gables, v.

17. Fund; sum of money.

Mr. John Whitson being Mayor, with his brethren the Aldermen, and most of the Merchants of the City of Bristol, raised a stock of 1000*l.* to furnish out two Barks.
Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 108.

It's proverbial He gave them an alms-penny, for which reason Judas carried the bag that had a common stock in it for the poor.

stock-taking (stok'tā king), n. See to take stock, under *stock*¹.

stock-whaup (stok'hwāp), n. The curlew, Numenius arquata; the whaup.

stockwork (stok'wōrk), n. [*stock*¹ + work; tr. G. stockwerk.] In mining, that kind of ore-deposit in which the ore is pretty generally or uniformly distributed through a large mass of rock, so that the excavations are not limited to a certain narrow zone, as they are in the case of an ordinary fissure-vein. This mode of occurrence is almost exclusively limited to, and very characteristic of, stanniferous deposits, and the word is used especially in describing those of the Erzgebirge. Also called stockwerk (the German name).

The name of interlaced masses, or stockworks, is given to masses of igneous rock penetrated by a great number of little veins of metallic ores which cross in various ways. Callon, Mining (tr. by Le Neve Foster and Galloway), i. 47.

The stockwerk consists of a series of small veins interlacing with each other and ramifying through a certain portion of the rock.

J. D. Whitney, Met. Wealth of the U. S., p. 39.

stocky (stok'i), a. [*stock*¹ + -y, cf. stodgy.] 1. Short and stout; stumpy; stock-like.

They had no titles of honour among them but such as denoted some bodily strength or perfection: as, such a one "the tall," such a one "the stocky," such a one "the gull."
Addison, Spectator, No. 433.

2. In zool., of stout or thick-set form; stout-bodied. 3. In bot., having a strong, stout stem, not spindling.

Stocky plants, vigorous, and growing rapidly, are better than simply early plants. Science, XIV, 164.

4. Headstrong; stubborn. [Prov. Eng.]

stock-yard (stok'yārd), n. An inclosure connected with a railroad, or a slaughter-house, or a market, etc., for the distribution, sorting, sale, or temporary keeping of cattle, swine, sheep, and horses. Such yards are often of great size, and are arranged with pens, sheds, stables, conveniences for feeding, etc.

stodgy (stoj'i), a. [Assimilated form of stodgy, ult. of stocky.] 1. Heavy; lumpy; distended. [Colloq., Eng.]

"Maggie," said Tom, "you don't know what I've got in my pockets. . . . No," said Maggie. "How stodgy they look, Tom! Is it mauls or coburns?"
George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, i. 5.

2. Crammed together roughly; lumpy; crude and indigestible. [Colloq., Eng.]

The book has too much the character of a stodgy summary of facts. Saturday Rev.

3. Wet; miry. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

stœchiology, stœchiometrical, etc. Same as stœchiology, etc.

stog (stog), v.; pret. and pp. stogged, ppr. stogging. [stock, n.; ult. a var. of *stock*¹, v. cf. stodge, v.] 1. trans. 1. To plunge a stick down through (the soil), in order to ascertain its depth; probe (a pool or marsh) with a pole. [Scotch.] 2. To plunge and fix in mire; stall in mud; mire. [Colloq., Eng.]

It was among the ways of good Queen Bess, Who ruled as well as mortal ever can, When she was stogged, and the country in a mess, She was wont to send for a Devon man, sir.
West Country song, quoted in Kingsley's Westward Ho, x.

II. intrans. To plant the feet slowly and cautiously in walking. Junison. [Scotch.] stogy (stō'gi), a. and n. [< stog + -y. Cf. stodgy, stocky.] I. a. Rough; coarse; heavy: as, stogy shoes; a stogy cigar.

One of his legs, ending in a stogy boot, was braced out in front of him. The Century, XXXVI, 88.

II. n.; pl. stogies (-giz). 1. A rough, heavy shoe. — 2. A long, coarse cigar.

[Colloq. in all uses.]

stoic (stō'ik), a. and n. [Formerly also stock; = F. stoïque = Sp. estoico = Pg. estoico = It. stoico, < L. stoicus, < Gr. στωικός, pertaining to a porch or portico, specifically pertaining to that called Στωά Ποικίλη, 'the Painted Porch' in the Agora at Athens, and to the school of philosophy founded by Zeno, who frequented this porch.] I. a. [cap.] Pertaining to the Stoics, or to their teaching; as, a Stoic philosopher; the Stoic doctrine; hence, manifesting indifference to pleasure or pain (compare stoical).

II. n. 1. [cap.] A disciple of the philosopher Zeno, who founded a sect about 308 B. C. He taught that men should be free from passion, unmoved by joy or grief, and submit without complaint to the unavoidable necessity by which all things are governed. The Stoics are proverbially known for the sternness and austerity of their ethical doctrines, and for the influence which their tenets exercised over some of the noblest spirits of antiquity, especially among the Romans. Their system appears to have been an attempt to reconcile a theological pantheism and a materialist psychology with a logic which seeks the foundations of knowledge in the representations or perceptions of the senses, and a morality which claims as its first principle the absolute freedom of the human will. The Stoics teach that whatever is real is material; matter and force are the two ultimate principles; matter is of itself motionless and unformed, though capable of receiving all motions and all forms. Force is the active, moving, and molding principle, and is inseparably joined with matter; the working force in the universe is God, whose existence as a wise thinking being is proved by the beauty and adaptation of the world. The supreme end of life, or the highest good, is virtue—that is, a life conformed to nature, the agreement of human conduct with the all-controlling law of nature, or of the human will with the divine will; not contemplation, but action, is the supreme problem for man; virtue is sufficient for happiness, but happiness or pleasure should never be made the end of human endeavor. The wise man alone attains to the complete performance of his duty; he is without passion, although not without feeling; he is not indulgent, but just toward himself and others; he alone is free; he is king and lord, and is inferior in inner worth to no other rational being, not even to Zeus himself.

Certain philosophers of the Epicureans and of the Stoics encountered him. Aets xvii, 15.

Hence — 2. A person not easily excited; one who appears or professes to be indifferent to pleasure or pain; one who exhibits calm fortitude.

Flint-hearted Stoics, you, whose marble eyes Contain a wrinkle, and whose souls despise
To follow nature's too affected fashion.

Quarles, Emblems, ii, 4.

School of the Stoics, the Porch. See porch. stoical (stō'ik-əl), a. [< stoic + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of the Stoics; hence, manifesting or maintaining indifference to pleasure or pain; exhibiting or proceeding from calm fortitude: as, stoical indifference.

It is a common imputation to Seneca that, though he declaimed with so much strength of reason, and a stoical contempt of riches and power, he was at the same time one of the richest and most powerful men in Rome.

Steele, Tatler, No. 170.

Stoical ethics. See Stoic, n. 1.

stoically (stō'ik-əl-i), adv. In the manner of the Stoics, or of a stoic; without apparent feeling or sensibility; with indifference to pleasure or pain; with calm fortitude.

stoicalness (stō'ik-əl-nes), n. The state of being stoical; indifference to pleasure or pain; calm fortitude.

stoicheiology (stoi-kī-ol'ō-jī), n. [Also stoichiology, and more prop. stoechiology; < Gr. στοιχειον, a small post, also a first principle (dim. of στοιχος, a row, rank, < στοιχειν, go in line or order; see stich), + -λογία, < λογία, speak; see -ology.] A division of a science which treats of the nature of the different kinds of objects that science deals with, but not of the manner in which they are associated with one another; the doctrine of elements.

The conditions of mere thinking are given in certain elementary requisites; and that part of logic which analyzes and considers these may be called its stoicheiology, or doctrine of elements. . . . Logical stoicheiology, or the doctrine conversant about the elementary requisites of mere thought. . . . In its stoicheiology, or doctrine of elements, logic considers the conditions of possible thought.

Sir W. Hamilton, Logic, iv., xxiv.

stoicheiometrical (stoi-kī-ol'-met'ri-kal), a. [Also stoechiometrical; < stoicheiometria + -ic.] Pertaining to stoicheiometry.

stoicheiometry (stoi-kī-ol'-me-trī), n. [Also stoechiometry; < Gr. στοιχειον, a first principle, + μετρον, a measure; see meter.] The science of calculating the quantities of chemical elements involved in chemical reactions or processes.

Stoicant, n. [ME. stoicien; as Stoic + -ian.] A Stoic. Chaucer, Boethius, v. meter 4.

stoicism (stō'is-izm), n. [= F. stoïcisme; as stoic + -ism.] 1. [cap.] The opinions and maxims of the Stoics; also, the conduct recommended by the Stoics. — 2. A real or pretended indifference to pleasure or pain; the bearing of pain without betraying feeling; calm fortitude.

He [Nicomachus] had just parted from those who were most nearly connected with him. Their cries and contortions had appalled the European ministers of justice, but had not produced the smallest effect on the iron stoicism of the prisoner. Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

= Syn. 2. Insensibility, Impassibility, etc. See apathy. stoicity (stō-is'i-tī), n. [< stoic + -ity.] Stoicalness; stoical indifference. B. Janson, Epictetus, i, 1.

stoit (stōit), v. i. [A dial. var. of stol.] 1. To walk in a staggering way; totter; stumble on any object. [Scotch.] — 2. To leap from the water, as certain fish. Day, [Prov. Eng.]

stoiter (stōi'tēr), v. i. [A dial. var. of stolter.] Same as stoit.

stoke¹, v. t. and i. [< ME. stoken, < OF. estoquer (= It. stoccare), stab, thrust, < stoc, a rapier, stock; see *stock*², stoccard.] To pierce; stick; thrust.

Ne short swerd for to stoke with point bytynge.

stoke² (stōk), v.; pret. and pp. stoked, pp. stoking. [< stoker, taken as an E. noun, < -stoke + -er, but appar. < D. stoker, < stoken, kindle a fire, incite, instigate, < MD. stoken, D. stok, a stick, stock, rapier; see *stock*¹. Cf. *stok*¹.] I. trans. To poke, stir up, and maintain the fire in (a furnace, especially one used with a boiler for the generation of steam for an engine); supply with fuel; trim and maintain combustion in.

Much skill is needed to stoke the furnace of a steam-boiler successfully; and one stoker will often be able to keep the steam well up when another of equal strength and diligence will fail altogether.

Beaude and Cox, Dict. Sci., Lit., and Art.

Cold stoking, in glass-manuf., the process of lowering the temperature of the oven until the glass attains the tough fluid consistency necessary for blowing.

II. intrans. To attend to and supply a furnace with fuel; act as a stoker or fireman.

stoke-hole (stōk'hōl), n. The compartment of a steamer in which the furnace-fires are worked; in the United States called fire-room.

stoker (stō'kēr), n. [< D. stoker, one who kindles or sets on fire, < stoken, kindle a fire, stir a fire, < stok, a stock, stick (hence a poker for a fire); see *stock*¹, and cf. *stoke*².] 1. One who attends to and maintains suitable combustion in a furnace, especially a furnace used in generating steam, as on a locomotive or steamship; a fireman. — 2. A poker. [Rare.] — Mechanical stoker, an automatic device for feeding fuel to a furnace, and for keeping the grate free from ashes and clinkers. Many such machines have been invented. Endless aprons or chains, or revolving toothed cylinders, are common feeders, distributing the coal to the grate in definite quantity as needed, while shaking grates, revolving grate-bars, and special bars called picker-bars, with teeth working in the air-spaces of the grate, are employed for the discharge of ashes and clinkers.

Stokesia (stō-kē'si-jī), n. [NL. (L'Heritier, 1788), named after Dr. Jonathan Stokes (1755-1831), a British botanist.] A genus of composite plants, of the tribe Uromeliaceae, subtribe Eucroniacea, and series Stilpnopapeze. It is characterized by large stalked heads of blue flowers, with smooth three- or four-angled achenes and a pappus of four or five long bristles. The corollas, unlike the tubular type otherwise prevalent in the tribe, are flattened above the middle and somewhat ligulate, and toward the outside of the head, by their increased size and deeply five-parted border, they suggest the tribe Cichoriaceae. The only species, S. cynancha, is a native of the southern United States near the Gulf of Mexico, a rare plant of wet pine-barrens. It is an erect shrub, clad above with loose wool and alternate clasping leaves, and bearing petioled leaves below, which are entire or spiny-fringed. The handsome blue flowers form large terminal heads which are purplish in the bud, resemble those of the China aster, and are grown in large quantities for the London market, under the name of Stokes's aster.

stola (stō'lā), n.; pl. stolae (-lē). [L.: see *stole*².] An ample outer tunic or dress worn by Roman women over the under-tunic or chemise; it fell as low as the ankles or feet, and was gathered in around the waist by a girdle. It was a characteristic garment of the Roman matrons, as the toga was of the men, and divorced women and courtisans were not permitted to wear it. See cut in preceding column.

stole¹ (stōl), n. Preterit and obsolete past participle of stall.

stole² (stōl), n. [< ME. stole, stool, < OF. estole, F. stola = Sp. Pg. estola = It. stola, < L. stola, a stola, robe, stole, < Gr. στολή, a long robe; orig., in a gen. sense, dress, equipment, sacerdotal vestment or vestments; < στίζω, set, array, despatch; see stell.] 1. A stola, or any garment of similar nature.

Forsooth the fadir seyde to his seruauntis, Soone brynge ge forth the first stole, and clothe ge him.

Wyclif, Luke xv. 22.

Behind, four priests, in sable stole,

Sung requiem for the warrior's soul.

Scott, I. of I. M., v. 30.

2. In the Roman Catholic, Oriental, and Anglican churches, an ecclesiastical vestment, consisting of a narrow strip of silk or other material, worn over the shoulders (by deacons over one shoulder) and hanging down in front to the knees or below them. It is widened and fringed at the ends, and usually has a cross embroidered on it at the middle and at each extremity. Stoles are worn of different colors, according to the ecclesiastical season. When celebrating the eucharist a priest wears his stole crossed upon the breast and secured by the girdle, at other times simply pendent from the shoulders. A bishop, on account of his pectoral cross, wears it pendent even when celebrating. A deacon wears it over the left shoulder and tied on the right side. In the Greek Church the stole has been worn since early times in two different forms, the deacon's (orarion) and the priest's (epitrachelion). Originally the stole was of linen, and probably was a napkin or cloth indicative of ministering at the altar and at agape.

The pall or omophorion is of entirely distinct origin. See orarium.

Forth comth the preest with stole aboute his nekke,
And had hire be lyke to Sarra and Rebekke
In wysdom and in trouthe of marriage.

Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 459.

3. A chorister's surplice or cotta: an occasional erroneous use.

Six little Singing-boys—dear little souls—
In nice clean faces, and nice white stoles.

Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 210.

4. In her., usually, a bearing representing a sear with straight and parallel sides, fringed at each end. — Groom of the stole, the first lord of the bed-chamber in the household of an English king. — Order of the Golden Stole, a Venetian order, the badge of which was a stole of cloth of gold worn over the robes. It disappeared with the independence of the republic of Venice. — Stole-fee, a fee paid to a priest for religious or ecclesiastical service, as for marriages, christenings, and funerals.

stole³ (stōl), n. Same as stolon.

stole⁴, n. An obsolete form of stool.

stoled (stōld), a. [*< stole*² + -ed.] Wearing a stole. G. Fletcher, Christ's Triumph After Death.

stolen (stō'ln), p. a. [Pp. of steal.] Obtained or acquired by stealth or theft: as, stolen goods.

Stolen waters are sweet. Prov. ix, 17.

Stolephoridae (stol-e-for'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. < Stolephorus + -idae.] A family of malacoptyergian fishes typified by the genus Stolephorus; the anchovies. The body is oblong or elongate; the snout is produced forward; the mouth is very large and inferior; the maxillaries are very narrow, and project backward; the dorsal fin is submedian and short; the anal fin is rather long; the pectorals are normal; and the ventrals are abdominal, but further advanced than usual, and of moderate size. There is no lateral line, but along the sides is generally developed a broad silvery band, to which the typical genus owes its name. The species are mostly of small size, rarely exceeding 6 inches, and often less. About 70 are known, some inhabiting almost all tropical and temperate seas. Engraulididae is a synonym.

stolephoroid (stō-lef'ō-roid), n. and a. [< Stolephorus + -oid.] I. n. A fish of the family Stolephoridae.

II. a. Of, or having characters of, the Stolephoridae.

Stolephorus (stō-lef'ō-rns), n. [NL. (Lacépède, 1803), < Gr. στολή, a stole, + φορεω = E. bear.] A genus of fishes, related to the herrings, but with a produced snout, and a broad silvery band which has been compared to the white stole or band worn by priests, typical of the family Stolephoridae (or Engraulididae). The common anchovy is S. encrasicolus. There are several others, as S. brasili, from Cape Cod to Brazil, abounding southward; S. ringens, from Vancouver Island to Peru, a large anchovy; S. delicatissimus and S. compressus, of the Californian and Mexican coasts, the latter locally known as sprat (see *sprat*²).

2 (c). This genus has been often called Engraulis. See cut under anchovy.

stolid (stol'id), a. [= Sp. estólido = Pg. estolido = It. stolido, < L. stolidus, unmovable, slow, dull, stupid; prob. akin to Gr. στεῖρος.] Heavy; dull; stupid; not easily moved; lacking in or destitute of susceptibility; denoting dullness or impassiveness; as, a stolid person; a stolid appearance.

But the stolid calm of the Indian alone Remains where the trace of emotion has been.
Whittier, Mogg Megone, i.

=Syn. Doltish, wooden.

stolidity (stol'id-i-ti), n. [= It. stolidità, < L. stoliditas], dullness, stupidity, < L. stolidus, dull, stupid; see stolid.] The state or character of being stolid; dullness; stupidity.

These certainly are the fools in the text, indolent, intractable fools, whose stolidity can baffle all arguments, and be proof against demonstration itself.

Bentley, Sermons, i.

=Syn. See stolid.

stolidly (stol'id-li), adv. In a stolid manner; as, to gaze stolidly at one. Bailey.

stolidness (stol'id-nes), n. Stolidity.

stolo (stō'lō), n.; pl. stolones (stō'lō'nēz). [L.: see stolon.] In zool., a stolon.—Stolo prolifer, the proliferating stolon of some animals, as certain ascidians; a germ-stock. See stolon, 2 (e).

stolon (stō'lōn), n. [NL.: < L. stolon], a shoot, branch, sucker. 1. In bot.: (a) In phanerogams, a reclined or prostrate branch which strikes root at the tip, developing a new plant.

Carex vulgaris, var. stolonifera, showing the stolons.

A very slender naked stolon with a bud at the end constitutes a runner, as of the strawberry. See also cut under Solidago. (b) In mosses, a shoot running along or under the ground, and eventually rising into the air and producing fully leafed shoots. Goebel.—2. In zool., some proliferated part or structure, likened to the stolon of a plant, connecting different parts or persons of a compound or complex organism, and usually giving rise to new zooids by the process of budding. See cuts under Campularia and Willisia. (a) A process of protoplasm between the different compartments of a multicellular foraminifer. (b) The procumbent, adherent, or creeping basal section of the stock of some social infusorians. (c) One of the prolongations of the cenosarc of some actinozoans. (d) The second stage of the embryo of some hydrozoans. (e) The germ-stock or prolongation of the tunica of some compound ascidians, as a salp; a stolo prolifer. See cuts under Salpa and Cyathozoid.

Also stole.

stolonate (stō'lōn-āt), a. [< stolon + -ate].] In zool., giving rise to or provided with a stolon or stolons; originating in a stolon; stoloniferous.

stoloniferous (stō'lō-nif'er-us), a. [< L. stoloniferus], a shoot, sucker, + ferre, bear, carry; see -ferous.] Producing or bearing stolons; proliferating, as an ascidian or a hydroid; stolonate.

stolzite (stol'zit), n. [Named after Dr. Stolz of Teplitz in Bohemia.] Native lead tungstate, a mineral occurring in tetragonal crystals of a green, brown, or red color, and resinous or subadamantine luster. Sometimes called schertelite.

stoma (stō'mā), n.; pl. stomata (-ma-tā). [NL.: < Gr. στόμα (stoma), pl. στόματα, the mouth, a mouth, opening, entrance or outlet, a chasm, cleft, etc., the face, front, fore part, etc.; = Zend staman, mouth. Cf. stomach, from the same source.] 1. In zool., a mouth or ingestive opening; an oral orifice; an ostium or ostiole; chiefly used of small or simple apertures, as a cytostome; hence, also, a small opening of any kind through which something may pass in or out; a pore. Specifically—(a) An opening of a lymphatic vessel; a lymphatic pore or orifice, as an interstice between the cells of a serous membrane. (b) The outer opening of a trachea or air-tube of an insect; a spiracle or breathing-hole. (c) A branchial pore of an ascidian or acranial vertebrate.

2. In bot., a minute orifice or slit in the epidermis of leaves, etc., which opens directly into air-cavities or intercellular spaces that pervade the interior, and through which free ingress and egress of air take place; a breathing-pore. The apparatus of the stoma consists usually of a pair of cells (there are several in the Equisetum, Hepaticae, etc.), called guard-cells or subsidiary-cells, between the opposed concave sides of which lies the slit or opening, which extends through the whole height of the epidermis and permits free communication between the intercellular spaces and the external air. According to Van Tieghem, the stomata are always open in sunlight and closed in darkness. These cells are strongly thickened on the upper and under walls of their opposed faces, while elsewhere their walls are relatively thin. The opening and closing of a stoma depend upon the difference in thickness of the parts of the walls. When the turgescence of the guard-cells increases, they curve more strongly, and consequently the cleft widens; but with decreased turgescence the cleft becomes narrower. See also cut under Iris.

Longitudinal Section of a Stoma taken from the leaf of Cucurbita pepeliformis. Magnified.

1. Strobilanthes. 2. Linnæa. 3. Plumeria. Stomata. Magnified.

3. In Swedenborg's philosophy, a cubical figure with hollowed surfaces, being the figure of the interstices of spheres arranged in what Swedenborg calls the fixed quadrilateral pyramidal position, supposed to be that natural to the spherical particles of water.

stomacae (stō-mak'ā-sē), n. [NL.: < L. stomacae, < Gr. στομακία, a disease of the month, scurvy of the gums, < στόμα, mouth, + ἀκαθία, badness, < κακός, bad.] Ulcerous stomatitis. See stomatitis.

stomach (stum'ak), n. [Now conformed terminally to the L. spelling, but pron. according to its ME. origin; early mod. E. stomack, stomacke, stomak, stomake; < ME. stomak, stomake, stomoke; < OF. estomac, estomach, F. estomac = Pr. estomach = Sp. estómago = Pg. estômago = It. stomaco, the stomach, < L. stomachus, the throat, gullet, also the stomach, fig. taste, liking, also distaste, dislike, irritation, chagrin, < Gr. στόμαχος, the throat, gullet, the orifice of the stomach, hence also the stomach, lit. (as shown also in other uses, the neck of the bladder or of the uterus, etc.) a mouth or opening, < στόμα, mouth, opening; see stoma.] 1. The throat; the gullet; the mouth.

Spiteful tongues in cankered stomachs placed.

Raleigh. (Imp. Dict.)

2. A more or less sac-like part of the body where food is digested. In the lowest animals any part of the sarcode or protoplasmic substance of the body is capable of digesting food, and forms during the process a temporary stomach, as in an amoeba. In many infusorial animals special vacuoles containing food are formed. These are inconstant both in number and in position, whence Ehrenberg's name, Polygastria, for these organisms. In the highest protozoans, which have a definite oral or ingestive area, there is likewise a more or less fixed digestive tract, constituting a stomach. A few of the metazoans have no true digestion, and consequently no stomach; such are the parenchymatous or anenterous worms, which imbibe or soak in nutriment already elaborated in the tissues of the host of which they are parasites. But the vast majority of animals above the protozoans have an intestinal digestive tract the whole or a part of which may properly be called a stomach. In most of these, again, a definite stomach exists as a specialized, usually dilated, part of the alimentary canal, in which food is subjected to a certain degree of digestion subsequent to mastication and insalivation and prior to further digestive changes which go on in the intestine. Among vertebrates more than one section of the alimentary canal is called a stomach, and many vertebrates have more than one. Thus, in birds there are a true glandular stomach, the proventriculus, in which the esophagus ends, and a muscular or grinding stomach, the gizzard or gizzard. In mammals the stomach always extends from the end of the gullet to the beginning of the gut. It is of extremely variable size and shape. Kinds of mammalian stomachs sometimes distinguished are the simple, as in man, the carnivores, etc.; the complex or plurilocular stomach, as in various marsupials, rodents, some monkeys, etc.; and the compound or pluriportal. The last is confined to the ruminants. (See Ruminantia.) In man the stomach is the most dilated and most distensible part of the alimentary canal. It occupies parts of the left hypochondriac and epigastric regions of the abdomen, immediately within the abdominal walls, below the diaphragm and partly under the liver, to the right of the spleen, and above the transverse colon. In form it is irregularly conoidal, and curved upon itself. When moderately distended it is about 12 inches long and 4 wide; it weighs 3 or 4 ounces. But the size, shape, and hence the anatomical relations, vary greatly in different individuals and in different states of distention. It begins where the gullet ends, at the esophageal or cardiac orifice, and ends at the pyloric orifice, where the duodenum begins. From the cardiac orifice the stomach bulges to the left in a great cul-de-sac, the fundus, containing, or cardiac end, in contact with the spleen, and from this greatest caliber the organ lessens in diameter with a sweep to the right. The lesser curvature or short border of the stomach, between the cardiac and pyloric orifices, is uppermost, and is connected with the liver by the lesser or gastrohepatic omentum. The greater curvature or long border of the stomach is opposite the other, between the same two points, and gives attachment to the great or gastrosplenic omentum. These two curvatures separate the anterior and posterior surfaces. The stomach is held in place by folds of peritoneum, the gastrosplenic, gastrohepatic, gastrosplenic, and gastrophrenic omenta, the last of which gives it most fixity. The arteries of the stomach are the gastric (a branch from the celiac axis), the pyloric and right gastro-epiploic branches of the hepatic, the left gastro-epiploic, and short branches from the splenic artery. The veins end in the splenic, superior mesenteric, and portal veins. The numerous lymphatics consist of a deep set and a superficial set. The nerves are the terminal branches of both pneumogastrics and many branches from the sympathetic system. The coats of the stomach are four—serous, muscular, submucous, and mucous. The serous layer is the peritoneum, which covers the whole organ on both its surfaces, and is reflected away from it along each of its curvatures. The muscular coat includes three sets of fibers—longitudinal, circular, and oblique, the last chiefly limited to the cardia. The submucous coat is simply the connective tissue between the muscular layer and the mucous membrane lining the stomach. This mucous membrane is the so-called "coat" of the stomach. It is thick, pinkish, reddish, or brownish, with a soft velvety surface, thrown into longitudinal folds or rugae when the organ is contracted. Studding the surface of the mucous membrane are numberless depressions or alveoli of polygonal tendency to hexagonal form, $\frac{1}{16}$ to $\frac{1}{8}$ of an inch in diameter; these are the enlarged mouths of the tubular gastric glands, which secrete the gastric juice by the action of which gastric digestion is effected. Two kinds of these follicles are distinguished by their microscopic structure—the pyloric and the cardiac. The former are found chiefly at and near the pyloric end, the latter most typical at the cardiac, and there are intermediate forms in intermediate regions. The epithelium lining the mucous membrane and its alveoli is of the kind called columnar. Besides the four coats above described, a fifth, a layer of involuntary muscular fibers between the mucous membrane and the submucous layer, is distinguished as the muscularis mucosae. The digestive activity of the stomach is intermittent, and depends upon the stimulus which the presence of food occasions. The muscular arrangement is such that food is continually rolled about, so that every part of the mass is submitted to the action of the gastric juice. In the stomach the proteids are converted into albumins and peptones by the pepsin, milk is curdled by the rennet-ferment, the gelatiniferous tissues are dissolved, and other less important changes are effected. See also cuts under Alimentary, Asteroides, Appendicularia, Dibranchiata, Dolicharia, Intestine, peritoneum, Plumetella, pluteus, Protula, Pulmonata, Pneumogonida, Ruminantia, Salpa, Tragulus, and Tunicata.

3. The digestive person or alimentary zooid of a compound polyp. See gastrozooid.—4. In most insects of the orders Lepidoptera, Diptera, and some Hymenoptera, a bladder-like expansion of the esophagus, which can be dilated at the will of the insect; the sucking-stomach, by means of which the nectar of flowers or other liquid is sucked up, as water is drawn into a syringe. In mandibulate insects the ingluvies or crop takes the place of the sucking-stomach, and nearly all insects have two true stomachs, called proventriculus and ventriculus.

5. Appetite; desire or relish for food; as, to have a good stomach for one's meals.

The body is as so redy and penyble

To wake, that my stomach is destroyed,

Chaucer, Summoner's Tale, l. 129.

Pray, sent you, lords; we'll hear you company,

But with small stomach to taste any food.

Ben Jonson, Faithful Friends, iii. 2.

I'll make as bold with your meat; for the trot has got me a good stomach.

Cotton, in Warton's Angler, ii. 254.

In some countries, where men and women have good travelling stomachs, they begin with porridge; then they fall to capon, or so forth, but if capon come short of filling their bellies, to their porridge again, 'tis their only course.

Webster and Decker, Northward Ho, i. 1.

Hence—6. Relish; taste; inclination; liking; as, to have no stomach for controversy.

He also hath tolde me moche off his stomach and tendre liver that he owthe to yow.

Paston Letters, III. 160.

Finding that the citizens had apparently no stomach for the fight he removed his trophies and took his departure.

Atty. Dutch Republic, II. 66.

7. Disposition. (a) Spirit; temper; heart.

Though I be not worthy to receive any favor at the hands of your master-ship, yet is your excellent herte and noble stomack worthy to shewe favour.

Edall, in Lillis's Lit. Letters, p. 4.

This was no small Magnanimity in the King, that he was able to pull down the high Stomachs of the Prelates in that time.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 50.

(b) Compassion; pity.

Nere myn extorcoun I myghte nat lyven,
Nor of swiche japes wol I nat be shryven, Stomak ne conscience ne knowe I noon.

Chaucer, Friar's Tale, l. 143.

(c) Courage; spirit.

For in them, as men of stowter stomackes, bolder spirits, and manly courage then handycraftes men and plowmen be, doth consist the whole powre, strength, and puissance of our army, when we muste fight in battayle.

Sir T. More, Utopia, tr. by Robinson, p. 39.

(d) Pride; haughtiness; conceit.

He was a man
Of an unbounded stomach, ever ranking Himself with princes.

Shak., Hen. VIII., iv. 2. 34.

(e) Spleen; anger; choler; resentment; sullenness.

From that time King Richard, moored in stomacke against King Philip, neuer shewed any gentle countenance of peace & amitie.

Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 23.

Many learned men have written, with much diversitie for the matter, and therefore with great contrarietie and some stomacke amongst them selves.

Acham, The Scholemaster, p. 123.

Which might teach these times not suddenly to condemn all things that are sharply spoken, or vehemently written, as proceeding out of stomach, virulence, and ill nature.

Milton, Church-Government, ii. 1, Int.

Circulating stomach, one of the temporary food-vacuoles of an infusorian or other protozoan, which moves about with a kind of cyclosis. See Polygastrica.—Frigidity of the stomach, a state of gastric debility formerly considered to depend on sexual excesses.—Fullness of the stomach, a feeling of weight or distention in the epigastric region.—Glandular stomach. See proentericus.—Hypogoniesia of the stomach, unnatural smallness of the stomach, seen in some children.—Masticatory stomach. See masticatory.—Muscular stomach. See muscular and gizzard.—Pit of the stomach, the depression just below the sternum; same as epigastrium, 1. Also called infrasternal fossa, scrobiculus cordis, and anticardium.—Proud stomach, a haughty disposition. Compare def. 7.

Truths which are as unweelcome to a proud stomach as wet clover to a cow's.

Scott, Pirate, xviii.

Rugæ of the stomach, folds of the mucous membrane, present when the organ is contracted, and extending for the most part in a longitudinal direction. See cut in def. 2.—Sour stomach, that condition of the stomach which causes acid eructations.—Sucking-stomach. See def. 4.—To stay the stomach. See stay.

stomach (stum'ak), v. [= OE. estomaquer = Sp. estomagar = It. stomacare, disgust, refl. feel disgust, < L. stomachari, feel disgust, be angry, < stomachus, distaste, dislike, stomach; see stomach, n.] I. trans. 1†. To encourage; hearten.

When he had stomached them by the Holy Ghost to shoot forth his word without fear, he went forward with them by his grace, conquering in them the price of this world.

Ep. Bale, Select Works (Parker Soc.), p. 313.

2†. To hate; resent; remember or regard with anger or resentment.

If that any stomach this my deed,

Alphonso can revenge thy wrong with speed.

Greene, Alphonso, iii.

A plague on them all for me! . . . O, I do stomach them hugely.

E. Jowson, Every Man in his Humour, iii. 2.

3. To put up with; bear without open resentment or opposition; as, to stomach an affront.

"The priests talk," said he, "of absolution in such terms that laymen can not stomach it."

Molten, Dutch Republic, I. 76.

4. To turn the stomach of; disgust. [Rare.]

It is not because the restaurants are very dirty—if you wipe your plate and glass carefully before using them, they need not stomach you.

Howell, Venetian Life, vi.

II.† intrans. To be or become angry.

What one among them commonly doth not stomach at such contradiction?

Hooker.

stomachal (stum'ak-al), a. and n. [= F. stomacal = Sp. estomacal = It. stomacale, < NL. stomachalis*, < L. stomachus, stomach; see stomach.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the stomach; gastric; as, stomachal tubes.

The body-wall, which encloses the stomachal cavity.

Geybaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 92.

2. Relating to the stomach, or to a region of the body which contains the stomach; gastric; epigastric; abdominal; ventral; as, the stomachal part of a crab's carapace.—3. Remedial of a disordered stomach; peptic or digestive; cordial; stomachic.

Stomachal teeth, sharp, horny processes of the lining of the proventriculus, and sometimes of other parts of the alimentary canal, found in many insects and crustaceans, and serving for the comminution of food.

II. n. A stomachic.

stomach-animalst (stum'ak-an'i-malz), n. pl. The Infusoria. See Polygastrica. Oken.

stomach-brush (stum'ak-brush), n. A brush designed to be introduced into the stomach, by way of the esophagus, to stimulate secretion.

stomach-cough (stum'ak-kōf), n. A form of reflex cough excited by irritation of the stomach or small intestine.

stomacher (stum'ak-ēr), n. [< stomach, v., + -er.] 1. One who stomachs, in any sense of the word.—2†. A stomachic; an appetizer.

In Sir Kenelm Digby's "Choice and Experimental Receipts in Physick and Chirurgery" (London, 1675) I find a preparation of herbs for external application with this heading: "To strengthen the stomach use the following stomacher."

N. and Q., 7th ser., IV. 173.

3. A part of the dress covering the front of the body, generally forming the lower part of the bodice in front and usually projecting down into the skirt or lapping over it—the name being given to the whole front piece covering the pit of the stomach and the breast. In some fashions the stomacher was richly embroidered, and ornamented with jewels, as in Europe in the sixteenth century.

Less fashionable ladies, between 1615 and 1625, discarded the tight and pointed stomacher and farthingale, and wore, over an easy jerkin and ample petticoat, a loose gown open in front, made high to meet the ruff.

Encyc. Brit., VI. 473.

4. A plaque or brooch, usually large, the name being derived from that part of the dress upon which the brooch was worn. J. B. Atkinson, Art Jour. (1867), p. 203.

stomachful (stum'ak-fūl), a. [Early mod. E. also stomackful; < stomach + -ful.] Full of stomach or wilfulness; proud; spirited; wilful; perverse; stubborn; sturdy.

From all those Tartars he hath had an Army of an hundred and twenty thousand excellent swift, stomachful Tartarian horse.

Capt. John Smith, True Travels, I. 39.

Nay, if I had but any body to stand by me, I am as stomachful as another.

Wycherley, Plain Dealer, iii. 1.

stomachfully (stum'ak-fūl-i), adv. In a stomachful, or perverse or wilful, manner; stubbornly; perversely. Ep. Hall, The Golden Calf.

stomachfulness (stum'ak-fūl-nes), n. Stubbornness; perverseness; wilfulness.

Pride, stomachfulness, headiness—avail but little.

Grainger, On Eccles. (1621), p. 248.

stomach-grief (stum'ak-grēf), n. Anger.

Stomach-grief is when we will take the matter as hot as a taste. We need no examples for this matter, hot men have to many.

Sir T. Wilson, Art of Rhetoric.

stomachic (stō-mak'ik), a. and n. [= F. stomachique = Sp. estomacico = Pg. estomacico = It. stomachico, < L. stomachicus, < Gr. στωμαχικός, pertaining to the stomach, < στωμαχός, the stomach; see stomach.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the stomach. (a) Stomachal; gastric; as, stomachic vessels or nerves. (b) Specifically, sharpening the appetite, and stimulating gastric digestion. See stomachal, 3.

He [Boswell] was . . . gluttonously fond of whatever would yield him a little solacement, were it only of a stomachic character.

Carlyle, Boswell's Johnson.

Stomachic balsam, a mixture of balsam of Peru with oil of nutmeg and other volatile oils, as those of wormwood, cloves, mace, peppermin, orange-peel, and amber, made up in different proportions.—Stomachic calculus, a concretion, usually containing hair, found in the stomach, particularly of lower animals. See bezoar.—Stomachic fever, gastric fever. See fever.

II. n. A medicine which sharpens the appetite, and is supposed to stimulate digestion, as the bitter tonics; a stomachic.

stomachical (stō-mak'ik-al), a. [< stomachic + -al.] Same as stomachic. Wiseeman, Surgery, I. 18.

stomaching (stum'ak-ing), n. [Verbal n. of stomach, v.] Resentment. Shak., A. and C., ii. 2. 9.

stomachless (stum'ak-less), a. [Early mod. E. stomackless; < stomach + -less.] Lacking stomach; having no appetite. Ep. Hall, Balm of Gilead, ii. § 6.

stomachous (stum'ak-us), a. [< L. stomachosus, angry, choleric, < stomachus, distaste, dislike; see stomach.] Resentful; sullen; obstinate.

Young blood is hot; youth hasty; ingenuity open; abuse impatient; choleric stomachous.

G. Harvey, Four Letters.

stomach-piece (stum'ak-pēs), n. In ship-carp., same as apron, 3.

stomach-plaster (stum'ak-plās'tēr), n. See plaster.

stomach-pump (stum'ak-pump), n. A small pump or syringe used in medical practice for the purpose of emptying the stomach or of introducing liquids into it. It resembles the common syringe, except that it has two apertures near the end, instead of one, in which the valves open different ways, so as to constitute a sucking and a forcing passage. When the object is to empty the stomach, the pump is worked while its sucking orifice is in connection with a flexible tube passed into the stomach; and the extracted matter escapes by the forcing orifice. When, on the contrary, the object is to force a liquid into the stomach, the tube is connected with the forcing orifice, by which the action of the pump is reversed. It is now not much used, the stomach being emptied, when necessary, by the stomach-tube working as a siphon.

stomach-qualified (stum'ak-kwāmd), a. Same as stomach-sick. Shak., Cymbeline, iii. 4. 193.

stomach-sick (stum'ak-sik), a. Nauseated; qualmish; hence, having an aversion.

Receiving some hurt in his stomach by drinking those cold waters, he pruned stomach-sick to his expedition also.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 289.

stomach-staggers (stum'ak-stag'ēr), n. A disease in horses, depending on a paralytic affection of the stomach. The animal so affected dozes in the stable, resting his head in the manger; on waking, or being aroused, he falls to eating, and continues to eat voraciously, death from apoplexy or repletion often resulting.

stomach-sweetbread (stum'ak-swēt'bred), n. The pancreas of the calf, as used for food: distinguished from the throat-sweetbread, or thymus gland of the same animal.

stomach-timber (stum'ak-tim'bér), n. Same as belly-timber. [Slang.]

As Prior tells, a clever poet, . . .

The main strength of every member

Depends upon the stomach timber.

Combe, Dr. Syntax's Tours, xxxiii.

stomach-tooth (stum'ak-tōth), n. A lower canine milk-tooth of infants: so called because there is often gastric disturbance at the time of its appearance.

stomach-tube (stum'ak-tūb), n. A long flexible tube to be introduced into the stomach, through the gullet, as for washing out the stomach.

stomach-worm (stum'ak-wērm), n. A common intestinal roundworm, Ascaris lumbricoides, sometimes found in the human stomach.

stomachy (stum'ak-i), a. [< stomach + -y.] Proud; haughty; irascible; easily offended. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

stomack, stomak, stomaket, n. Obsolete spellings of stomach.

stomapod (stō-mā-pod), a. and n. Same as stomatopod.

Stomatopoda (stō-māp'ō-dā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. στόμα, mouth, + ποδ (pod) = E. foot.] Same as Stomatopoda. Latreille, 1817.

stomatopodiform (stō-māp'ō-dī-fōrm), a. [< NL. Stomatopoda + L. forma, form.] Resembling or shaped like a stomatopod, especially of the genus Squilla. Applied in entomology to certain elongate, somewhat flattened larvae which have the abdomen wider than the thorax, long antennae, and six legs, the anterior pair being large and raptorial. In aquatic species the body is furnished with lateral false gills. The larvae of Ephemera are examples of this form.

stomatopodous (stō-māp'ō-dus), a. [< stomatopod + -ous.] Same as stomatopod.

stomata, n. Plural of stoma.

stomatal (stō-mā-tal), a. [< NL. stoma(t)- + -al.] In bot. and zool., relating or belonging to stomata.

stomate (stō-māt), a. and n. [*< NL. stomatus for stomatatus*, < stoma (stomat-), a stoma; see stoma.] I. a. Having a stoma or stomata; stomatous.

II. n. A stoma.

stomatia, n. Plural of stomatium.

stomatic (stō-mat'ik), a. and n. [= It. stomatico, < Gr. στωματικός, of or pertaining to the mouth, < στόμα (stō-mā), mouth; see stoma.] I. a. In zool. and bot., of or pertaining to a stoma or stomata; oral.

II. n. A medicine for diseases of the mouth.

stomatiferous (stō-mā-tif'ē-rus), a. [< NL. stoma(t)- + L. ferre, bear, carry; see -ferous.] Bearing or provided with stomata; stomatophorous.

stomatitis (stō-mā-tīt'is), n. [NL., < Gr. στόμα (stō-mā), mouth, + -itis.] Inflammation of the interior of the mouth, including the mucous membrane of the lips, gums, tongue, cheeks, and palate.—Aphthous stomatitis, inflammation of the mucous membrane of the mouth-cavity, consisting in the formation of small superficial ulcers. Also called aphthae, canker sore, mouth, follicular or vesicular stomatitis.—Catarrhal stomatitis, a simple local or general inflammation of the mucous membrane of the mouth-cavity. Also called oral catarrh, erythema of the mouth, and erythematous, simple, and superficial stomatitis.—Gangrenous stomatitis. See noma.—Mercurial stomatitis, an inflammation of the mucous membrane of the mouth, with ulceration, caused by mercurial poisoning.—Parasitic stomatitis, inflammation of the mouth due to or complicated with the growth on the mucous membrane of Odium albicans. Also called thrush, pseudomembranous stomatitis.

—Ulcerous stomatitis, inflammation of the mucous membrane of the mouth-cavity, usually unilateral, resulting in the formation of multiple ulcers. Also called fetid stomatitis, phlegmonous stomatitis, and putrid sore mouth.

stomatium (stō-mā-shi-un), n.; pl. stomatia (-iā). [NL., dim. of stoma: see stoma.] A stoma.

Stomatoda (stō-mā-tō-dā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. stōma(τ-), mouth, + daō, form.] Dujardin's name for the ciliate infusorians, regarded by him as the only animals with distinct stomata, or oral apertures; distinguished from Astomata, or the supposed mouthless flagellate infusorians.

stomatodæum (stō-mā-tō-dē-um), n.; pl. stomatodæa (-iā). [NL.: see stomatodæum.] Same as stomatodæum. [Rare.]

The stomatodæum: a sac-like involution of the epidermis abutting against the mesenteron, spacious, and well marked on account of its dense pigmentation. Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 171.

stomatode (stō-mā-tōd), a. and n. [< Gr. stōma(τ-), mouth, + daō, form.] I. a. Having a stoma or cytostome, as an infusorian; stomatophorous; or of pertaining to the Stomatoda.

As regards the classification of the Protozoa, a rough and useful division is into mouth-bearing or "stomatode" Protozoa, in which there is a distinct mouth, and mouthless or "astomatous" Protozoa. H. A. Nicholson.

II. n. A member of the Stomatoda.

stomatodendron (stō-mā-tō-den-dron), n.; pl. stomatodendra (-drā). [NL., < Gr. stōma(τ-), mouth, + dendron, a tree.] One of the dendritic branches of the Rhizostomida, ending in minute polypites. Encyc. Diet.

stomatodynia (stō-mā-tō-din-i-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. stōma(τ-), mouth, + dynē, pain.] Pain in the mouth.

stomatogastric (stō-mā-tō-gas'trik), a. [< Gr. stōma(τ-), mouth, + gastēr, stomach: see gastēr.] Of or pertaining to the mouth and stomach: applied to the set or system of visceral nerves which ramify upon the alimentary canal of many invertebrates. See figure and description.

Stomatogastric and other Visceral Nerves of Crayfish (Istacus fluviatilis).

The Crayfish possesses a remarkably well-developed system of visceral or stomatogastric nerves.

Huxley, Anat.

stomatological (stō-mā-tō-loj'i-kal), a. [< stomatolog-y + -ic-al.] Pertaining to stomatology.

stomatologist (stō-mā-tō-loj-i-jist), n. [< stomatolog-y + -ist.] One versed in stomatology.

stomatology (stō-mā-tō-lō-jī), n. [< Gr. stōma(τ-), mouth, + -logia, < lōgōs, speak: see -logia.] The sum of scientific knowledge concerning the mouth.

stomatomorphous (stō-mā-tō-mōr'fus), a. [< Gr. stōma(τ-), mouth, + mōrphē, form.] In bot., mouth-shaped.

stomatonecrosis (stō-mā-tō-nek-rō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. stōma(τ-), mouth, + nekrosis, deadness: see necrosis.] Gangrenous stomatitis. See stomatitis and nomia.

Stomatophora (stō-mā-tof'ō-rā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of stomatophorus: see stomatophorus.] Protozoa which are provided with a mouth or its equivalent: a higher series of protozoans; same as Infusoria, 2; opposed to Lipostomata.

stomatophorous (stō-mā-tof'ō-rus), a. [< NL. stomatophorus, < Gr. stōma(τ-), mouth, + phorē = E. bear.] Having a mouth or stoma; or of pertaining to the Stomatophora; not lipostomatous.

stomatoplastic (stō-mā-tō-plas'tik), a. [< stomatoplast-y + -ic.] Pertaining to stomatoplasty.

stomatoplasty (stō-mā-tō-plas'ti), n. [< Gr. stōma(τ-), mouth, + plastēs, verbal adj. of plasseō, form, mold.] Plastic surgery of the mouth.

stomatopod (stō-mā-tō-pod), a. and n. [< NL. stomatopod, < Gr. stōma(τ-), mouth, + pod (τ-), foot.] I. a. Having some of the legs close by the mouth, as a mantis-shrimp; or of pertaining to the Stomatopoda. Also stomatopodous, stomatopodous.

II. n. A member of the Stomatopoda, in any sense.

Also stomopod.

Stomatopoda (stō-mā-top'ō-dā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of stomatopod (-pod-): see stomatopod.] An order of malacostracous podophthalmic crustaceans, to which various limits have been assigned. (a) As constituted by Latreille in 1817, in the form Stomatopoda, the second order of Crustacea, the so-called sea-mantises, or gastropods, divided into two families, Urodele and Lipodonta, of which only the former are properly stomatopods, the other being the so-called glass-crabs (Phyllonotus), or larval forms of other crustaceans. Hence (b) An artificial order of the higher crustaceans, under which are included not only the Squilla or Stomatopoda proper, but also the Mudidae or opossum-shrimps, and related forms, the Luciferidae, etc. (c) Restricted by Huxley to the family Squilla. See cuts under mantis-shrimp and Squilla.

Squilla, Gonodactylus, and Coronis appear to me to differ so widely and in such important structural peculiarities, not only from the podophthalma proper, but from all other crustacea, as to require arrangement in a separate group, for which the title of Stomatopoda may well be retained. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 317.

stomatopodous (stō-mā-top'ō-dus), a. [< stomatopod + -ous.] Same as stomatopod.

Stomatopora (stō-mā-top'ō-rā), n. [NL. (Brown, 1835), < Gr. stōma(τ-), mouth, + porā, pore: see porā.] Same as Stomatopora.

stomatoporeid (stō-mā-top'ō-rōid), a. [< Stomatopora + -oid.] Pertaining to or characteristic of a coral of the genus Stomatopora. Geological Jour., XLV, iii, 566.

Stomatopterophora (stō-mā-top'te-rof'ō-rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. stōma(τ-), mouth, + ptērōs, feather, + phorē = E. bear.] In J. E. Gray's classification (1821), the fourth class of mollusks, divided into two orders, Pterobranchia and Dactylobranchia; the Pteropoda or pteropods.

stomatorrhagia (stō-mā-tō-rā-jī-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. stōma(τ-), mouth, + rhagē, < rhagō, break, burst.] Hemorrhage from the mouth.

stomatoscope (stō-mā-tō-skōp), n. [< Gr. stōma(τ-), mouth, + skōpō, view.] Any instrument for keeping the mouth open so as to permit the parts within to be inspected. Daughlison.

stomatotheca (stō-mā-tō-thē'kā), n.; pl. stomatothecæ (-sē). [NL., < Gr. stōma(τ-), mouth, + thēkē, box, chest.] In entom., the mouth-case, or that part of the integument of a pupa which covers the mouth.

stomatous (stō-mā-tus), a. [< Gr. stōma(τ-), mouth, + -ous.] Provided with stomata; stomatophorous; stomate.

Stomias (stō-mi-as), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1817), < Gr. stōma, mouth.] A genus of deep-sea fishes, typical of the family Stomiidae, having a long compressed body with delicate deciduous scales, a row of phosphorescent or luminous spots along each side, and a rayed dorsal opposite the anal fin: so called from the large and deep mouth, armed with a formidable array of teeth. S. ferax is found from Greenland to Cape Cod. Specimens are taken at various depths from 450 to 1,500 fathoms.

Stomiidae (stō-mi-at'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Stomias (see stomioid) + -idae.] A family of physostomous fishes, typified by the genus Stomias. They are deep-sea Atlantic fishes, of 5 or 6 species and 3 genera, divided into 2 subfamilies, according to the presence or absence of an adipose fin.

stomioid (stō-mi-ōid), a. and n. [< Stomias (assumed stem Stomi-).] I. a. Resembling a fish of the genus Stomias; of or pertaining to the Stomiidae.

II. n. Any fish of the family Stomiidae.

stomodæal (stō-mō-dē'al), a. Same as stomodæal.

stomodæum (stō-mō-dē-um), n.; pl. stomodæa (-iā). [NL., < Gr. stōma, mouth, + daō, by the way, < daōs, way.] An anterior part of the alimentary canal or digestive tract, being so much of the whole enteric tube as is formed at the oral end by an ingrowth of the ectoderm: correlated with proctodæum, which is derived from the ectoderm at the aboral end, both being distinguished from enteron proper, which is of endodermal origin.

stomodæal (stō-mō-dē'al), a. [< stomodæum + -al.] Pertaining to or having the character of a stomodæum. Also spelled stomodæal.

Stomoxys (stō-mok'si-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Stomoxys + -is.] A family of brachycerous dipterous insects, typified by the genus Stomoxys, often merged in the Muscidæ. It contains such genera as Stomoxys, Herminia, and Glossina, and includes some well-known biting flies, as the horn-fly, stable-fly, and tsetse-fly. Also Stomoxys (Weigen, 1834) and Stomoxys (Westwood, 1840), and, as a subfamily of Muscidæ, Stomoxys or Stomoxys.

Stomoxys (stō-mok'sis), n. [NL. (Geoffroy, 1764), < Gr. stōma, mouth, + oxys, sharp.] A notable genus of biting flies, typical of the family

Stomoxys, or merged with the Muscidæ. They are gray of medium size, and resemble the common house fly in appearance. The mouth-parts are developed into a horny proboscis. S. calcitrans, common to Europe and North America, is a familiar example. See stable-fly, 1.

stomp¹ (stomp), n. A dialectal form of stamp; specifically, in coal-mining, one of the plugs of wood driven into the roof of the level, to which are fastened the "lines" serving to direct the miner in his proper course; they may also be used as bench-marks. Gresley. [Midland coal-field, Eng.]

stomp², n. and v. An obsolete form of stamp.

stompers (stomp'pērs), n. pl. A dialectal form of stampers. See stampers, 3.

stonager (stō-nāj), n. [< stone + -ager.] A collection or heap of stones. Halliwel.

Would not everybody say to him, We know the stonager at Gilgal? Lodie (Nares).

stond (stond), v. and n. An obsolete or dialectal form of stand.

stondent. An obsolete past participle of stond.

stone (stōn), n. and a. [Also E. dial. stan, steen, Se. stane, stain; < ME. stoun, ston, stun, < AS. stān = OS. stān = OFries. stēn = D. steen = MLG. stēn, LG. stēn = OHG. MLG. G. stein = Icel. steinn = Sw. Dan. sten = Goth. stains, a stone; prob. akin to O Bulg. stena = Russ. stena, a wall, and to Gr. stēn, stōn, a stone. Hence steen, steinn.] I. n. 1. A piece of rock of small or moderate size. The name rock is given to the aggregation of mineral matter of which the earth's crust is made up. A small piece or fragment of this rock is generally called a stone, and to this qualifying term is frequently added, as, cobble-stone or gravel stone. See rock.

Lo, here be stonings hard y-wroughte.
Make hereof breech.

Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 43

Are there no stones in heaven
But what serve for the thunder?

Shak., Othello, v. 2, 234.

He is not a man, but a block, a very stone.
Burton, Anat., of Mel, p. 450.

2. The hard material of which rock consists; in contradistinction to metal, wood, etc.

Al hem to-dryven ase ston doth the glas.
Flemish Insurrection (Child's Ballads, VI, 270).

He made a harp of her breast-bone,
Whose sounds would melt a heart of stone.

The Cruel Sister (Child's Ballads, II, 236).

That we might see our own work out, and watch
The sandy footprint harden into stone.

Tennyson, Princess, iii.

3. A piece of rock of a determined size, shape, or quality, or used for a defined purpose: as, a grindstone; a hearthstone; an altar-stone. Specifically—(a) A gun-flint.

About seven of the clove marched forward the light pieces of ordnance, with stone and powder.

Holtzschel, Chron., III, 947.

(b) A gravestone; a monument or memorial tablet.

You shall shine more bright in these contents
Than unswept stone besmeared with sluttish time.

Shak., Sonnets, lv.

(c) A millstone. (d) In printing, an imposing-stone. (e) In glass-manuf., a flattening-stone.

4. A precious stone; a gem. See precious.

Wedges of gold, great anchors, heaps of pearl,
Inestimable stones, unvalued jewels.

Shak., Rich., III, i, 1, 17.

5. A small, hard, rounded object resembling a stone or pebble; as, a hail-stone; a gall-stone; an ear-stone. Specifically—(a) A calcareous concretion in the kidney or urinary bladder or gall bladder, etc.; hence, the disease arising from a calculus. (b) A testicle; generally in the plural. [Vulgar.] (c) The nut of a drupe or stone fruit, or the hard covering inclosing the kernel, and itself inclosed by the pulpy pericarp, as in the peach, cherry, or plum. See drupe and calculus (with cuts). (d) A hard, compact mass; a lump or nugget.

Marvellous great stones of yron.
Berners, tr. of Florentius's Chron., I, 498.

6. The glass of a mirror; a mirror of crystal.

Lend me a looking glass;
If that her breath will mist or stain the stone,
Why, then she lives.

Shak., Learn., v, 3, 262.

7. A common measure of weight in use throughout the northwest and central countries of Europe, but varying much in different countries. The English imperial standard stone is 14 pounds avoirdupois, and is commonly used in England in giving the weight of a man, but other values are in common use. Varying with the article weighed; thus, the stone of butcher's meat or fish is 8 pounds; of cheese 16 pounds; of glass 5 pounds; of alum 13 pounds; of hemp usually 22 pounds; though a statute of George II, made it 16 pounds; and one of Henry VIII, 20 pounds; of lead 12 pounds, though the statute of pound-ribus makes it 15 pounds of 5 "shillings" each, equal to 141 pounds avoirdupois. There were in the early part of the nineteenth century many local stones in use in England, but in the United States this unit is unknown. The stone of 14 pounds is not recognized in the statute de ponderibus, and first appears as a weight for wool. The old arithmetics call 14 pounds half a quarter, and either do not mention the stone, or define it as 8 pounds. The only legal stone in Great Britain now is that of 14 pounds.

And send ye me word how much more yn value yn a stone shall I syle my wolfe. Paston Letters, l. 155.

He was not a ghost, my visitor, but solid flesh and bone; He wore a Pado Alto hat, his weight was twenty stone.

O. W. Holmes, Nux Postconcentia.

Alencon stone, pure rock-crystal cut in rose or brilliant form. — Amazonian or Amazon stone. See Amazonite. — Arkansas stone, a fine-grain whetstone found in Arkansas, and used to sharpen surgical and dental instruments. — Armenian stone. See Armenian. — Artificial stone, a material prepared for decorative and building purposes by consolidating sand with the aid of some chemical. The best-known and most extensively used artificial stone is Ransome's, which is made by mixing sand with silicate of soda in a pug-mill, so as to form a plastic substance, which is then rolled or pressed into any desired form. The articles as thus prepared are then immersed in a solution of calcium chloride, when double decomposition takes place, a calcium silicate being formed which firmly cements the particles of sand together, while the sodium chloride, the other product of the decomposition, is afterward removed by washing. This material has been somewhat extensively used in England and elsewhere. Other processes akin to this, but in which different chemicals were used, have also been patented in the United States, but the materials thus produced have not met with any extensive sale. Beton or concrete has also been employed as a building material, to take the place of stone or brick, especially the "béton-coignet," which is extensively used in and near Paris and elsewhere. Beton and concrete, which are mixtures of sand, gravel, stone chippings, fragments of brick, etc., with common or hydraulic mortar or cement, are also frequently, but not correctly, designated artificial stone. — Ayr stone, a stone used for polishing marble and surfacing metals. The harder varieties are used as whetstones. Also called water of Ayr, Scotch stone, and snake-stone. — Bath stone, a rock used extensively for building purposes in England, and especially near Bath (whence its name). It is a limestone, having an oolitic structure, and belonging to the Inferior Oolite, which lies directly upon the Lias, the lowest division of the Jurassic of Continental and American geologists. Also called Bath oolite. — Beer stone, a hard sandy chalk stratum of small thickness, occurring westward of Scaton in Devonshire, England. It forms a part of the Lower Chalk, and contains Inoceramus angulatus. This series of beds, not having a thickness of more than 10 feet, is only of local importance, but it has been quarried as a building-stone for many hundred years, and parts of Exeter Cathedral are built of it. — Bologna stone, or Bolognian stone, a variety of barite, or barium sulphate, found in roundish masses, composed of radiating fibers, first discovered near Bologna. It is phosphorescent in the dark after being heated to ignition, powdered, and exposed to the sun's light for some time. — Bristol stone, rock-crystal, or Bristol diamond, small round crystals of quartz, found in the Clifton limestone, near the city of Bristol in England. — Caen stone, the French equivalent of the English Bath oolite. It is a cream-colored building-stone, of excellent quality, got near Caen in Normandy. Although soft in the quarry, it is of fine texture and hardens by exposure, so as to become extremely durable. Winchester and Canterbury cathedrals, Henry VII.'s chapel at Westminster, and many churches are built of it. It is still frequently used in England. — Cambay stones. See carneolite. — Centurial stones. See centurial. — Ceylon stone, a dark-green, brown, or black spinel from Ceylon, also called ceylonite; the name is also given to other minerals or gems from Ceylon. — Channel-stone. See channel. — Charnwood Forest stone, an oilstone found only in Charnwood Forest in Leicestershire, England. It is one of the best substitutes for the Turkey oilstone, and is much used to give a fine edge to knives and other tools. — Cornish stone. Same as china-stone, 2.

Cornish stone is used for almost all English wares, both in the body and the glaze. Spons' Encyc. Manuf., p. 1560.

Crab's stones. Same as crab's eyes (which see, under crab). — See also crabstone. — Crape stone, a trade-name for onyx of which the surface is cut in imitation of crape and colored a lustrous black. A similar article is made from artificial silicious compounds cast in molds. — Cut stone, hewn stone, or work in hewn stone; ashler. — Deaf as a stone. See deaf. — Dimension stone, ashler. — Drafted stone, ashler stone having a chisel-draft around the face, the part inside the draft being left rough. — Heracleon stone. See Heracleon. — Hewn stone, blocks of stone with faces dressed to shape by the hammer. — Holy stone, a stone used in magical rites, whether as a magic mirror or show-stone, or as a sort of amulet. — Infernal ledger, lithographic, Lydian stone. See the adjectives. — Maltese stone, a limestone of a delicate brown cream-color, very compact, and almost as soft as chalk. The natives of the island of Malta turn and carve it into various ornamental objects. — Memorial, meteoric, Moabite stone. See the adjectives. — Mocha stone (formerly also Moca stone; also Mocha-pibble; so called from Mocha in Arabia, where the stone is plentiful), a variety of dendritic agate, containing dark outlines of arborescence, like vegetable filaments, due to the presence of metallic oxides, as of manganese and iron; moss-agate. — Philosopher's stone. See elixer, l. — Portland stone, in England, a rock belonging to the Portlandian series; so named from the Isle of Portland, where it is typically developed. The Portlandian is a part of the Jurassic series, and lies between the Purbeckian, the highest member of that series, and the Kimmeridgian. The Portland group, or Portlandian, consists of two divisions, the Portland stone and the Portland sand; the former has several subdivisions, to which local names are attached, such as curl, base-bed, and whit-bed. The Portland stone, which is a nearly pure carbonate of lime, is an important building-stone in England, and was extensively used by Inigo Jones and Sir Christopher Wren, in important public buildings, especially in St. Paul's Cathedral. — Precious stone. See precious. — Protean stone. See Protean. — Quarry-faced stone, cut stone of which the face is left rough as it comes from the quarry, as distinguished from tooled, hammer-faced, pitch-faced stone, etc. — Rocking stone. See rock, 2. — Rosetta stone, a stele or tablet of black basalt, found in 1799 near Rosetta, a town of Egypt, on the delta of the Nile, by M. Boussard, a French officer of engineers. This stone bears a trilingual inscription, a decree of Ptolemy V. (Epiphanes) in Greek and Egyptian hieroglyphic and demotic. The inscription was deciphered chiefly by Champollion, and afforded the key to the interpretation of Egyptian hieroglyphics. The monument is now in the British Museum. — Rough-pointed stone. See rough. — Rubbed stone, stone-work of which the surface is cut straight with the stone-saw, and afterward smoothed by rubbing with grit or sandstone. — Samian stone. See Samian. — Saracen's stone. See Saracen. — Scotch stone. Same as Ayr stone. — Shipman's stone. See shipman. — Sonorous stone. See sonorous. — Standing stone. See standing. — Stick and stone. See stick, 3. — Stone cancer. Same as scirrhus cancer (which see, under scirrhus). — Stone of the second class. See elixer, l. — Stones of sulphur. See sulphur. — To leave no stone unturned, to do everything that can be done; use all practicable means to effect an object; spare no exertions.

New crimes invented, left unturned no stone

To make my guilt appear, and hide his own.

Dryden, Euclid, ii. l. 133.

To mark with a white stone, to mark as particularly fortunate, favored, or esteemed. The phrase arose from the custom among the Romans of marking their lucky days on the calendar with a white stone (as a piece of chalk), while unlucky days were marked with charcoal. Brewer, = Syn. 1 and 2. See rock.

II. a. 1. Made of stone: as, a stone house: a stone wall.

The lion on your old stone gates

Is not more costly to you than I.

Tennyson, Lady Clara Vere de Vere.

2. Made of stoneware: as, a stone jar; a stone mug.

Now mistress Gilpin (careful soul!)

Had two stone bottles found,

To hold the liquor that she loved,

And keep it safe and sound

Carver, John Gilpin.

Stone age. See archaeological ages, under age. — Stone ax, an ax-head or hatchet-head made of hard stone. Such axes are found, belonging to prehistoric epochs, and have also been in use down to the present time among savage tribes in different parts of the world. Compare stone-ax. — Stone brick. See brick, 2. — Stone jug. See jug, 2. — Stone ocher. See ocher.

Stone (stōn), v. t.; pret. and pp. stoned, ppr. stoning. [< ME. stenen, stunen (in earlier use stunen, whence mod. E. dial. stene), < AS. stēnan = OHG. stēnan, MHG. stēnen = Sw. stena = Dan. stene = Goth. stainjan (cf. D. stēnigen = G. steinigen), pelt with stones, stone; from the noun.] 1. To throw stones at: pelt with stones.

With stones men shulde hir stryke and stone hir to deth.

Piers Plowman (B), xii. 77.

Francis himself was stoned to death.

R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xv.

2. To make like stone; harden. [Rare.]

O perjur'd woman! thou dost stone my heart

Shak., Othello, v. 2. 63.

3. To free from stones, as fruit.

She picked from Polly's very hand the raisins which the good woman was stoning for the most awfully sacred election cake.

H. E. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 270.

4. To provide or fit with stones, as by lining, walling, or facing: as, to stone a well or a road. — 5. In leather-manuf., to work (the leather) with a stock-stone to reduce it to uniform thickness, stretch it, and make it smooth-grained.

stone-ax (stōn'aks), n. [*< ME. stanax, < AS. stānax, < stān, stone, + ax, ax.] An ax or a hammer with two somewhat obtuse edges, used in hewing stone.

stone-basil (stōn'baz'il), n. Same as basil-weed. — stone-bass (stōn'bās), n. A fish of the family Serranidae, Polyprion cernuum, or another of the same genus. It is distinguished by the development of a strong longitudinal bony ridge on the operculum, and the serration of the spines of the anal and ventral fins. It inhabits moderately deep water in the Mediterranean and neighboring Atlantic. (Also called reef-fish and cernier.) The corresponding stone-bass of Pacific waters is a very similar though distinct species, P. orygenius (originally orygenius). See Polyprion.

Stone-bass (Polyprion cernuum).

stone-bird (stōn'bērd), n. 1. The vinous grosbeak, or more. — 2. The stone-snipe, or greater yellowlegs. See cut under yellowlegs.

stone-biter (stōn'bi'tēr), n. The common wolf-fish. See cut under Anarrhichas.

stone-blind (stōn'blind'), a. [= Icel. stein-blindr = Sw. Dan. sten-blind; as stone + blind.] Blind as a stone; wholly blind, either literally or figuratively.

I thought I saw everything, and was stone-blind all the while.

George Eliot, Mr. Gilfil, xviii.

stone-blue (stōn'blā), n. A compound of indigo and starch or whiting.

stone-boat (stōn'bōt), n. A drag or sled without runners, used for moving stones; also, a wagon-platform hung below the axles, used for the same purpose. [U. S.]

stonebock (stōn'bōk), n. Same as steenbok.

stone-boilers (stōn'boi'lērz), n. pl. A tribe or race of men who practise stone-boiling.

The Anstralians, at least in modern times, must be counted as stone-boilers.

E. B. Tylor, Early Hist. Mankind, ix.

stone-boiling (stōn'boi'ling), n. The act or process of making water boil by putting hot stones in it.

The art of boiling, as commonly known to us, may have been developed through this intermediate process, which I propose to call stone-boiling.

E. B. Tylor, Early Hist. Mankind, ix.

stone-borer (stōn'bōr'ēr), n. A mollusk that bores stones; a lithodomous, lithophagous, or saxicavous bivalve. See cuts under accessory, date-shell, Glycymeris, and pidcock.

stone-bow (stōn'bō), n. [< ME. stonbowe; < stone + bow, 2.] A weapon somewhat resembling a crossbow, for shooting stones; a catapult; also, a sort of toy.

O, for a stone-bow, to hit him in the eye!

Shak., T. N., ii. 5. 51.

Item, six stone bowes that shoot lead pellets.

Hakluyt's Voyages, l. 363.

Children will shortly take him for a wall,

And set their stone-bows in his forehead.

Beau. and Fl., King and No King, v. l.

stone-bramble (stōn'brām'bl), n. Same as rochuck-berry.

stone-brash (stōn'brash), n. In agri., a sub-soil composed of shattered rock or stone.

stonebreak (stōn'brāk), n. The meadow-saxifrage, Saxifraga granulata; so called from the virtue, according to the doctrine of signatures, of its pebble-like bulbs against calculus. The name is also a general equivalent of saxifrage.

stone-breaker (stōn'brā'kēr), n. One who or that which breaks stones; specifically, a ma-

a, stationary jaw; a', oscillating jaw; b, hopper; c, fly-wheel; d, short pitman connecting crank-wrist with toggles e, e'; f, frame, strengthened at g, where the thrust of the toggles is received; h, base of machine; i, rubber spring which withdraws the lower end of the jaw a'.

chine for pounding or crushing stone; an ore-mill; a stone-crusher.

stone-bruise (stōn'brōz), n. A bruise caused by a stone; especially, a painful and persistent bruise on the sole of the foot, commonly in the middle of the ball of the foot, due to walking barefooted; also, a bruise produced on the hand, as by ball-playing. [Local, U. S.]

stonebuck (stōn'buk), n. [*< ME. stonbukke, < AS. stānbucca, the ibex, < stān, stone, rock, + bucca, buck. In mod. use, tr. D. steenbok, G. steinbok; see steenbok.] The steenbok.

stone-butter (stōn'but'ēr), n. A sort of alum.

stone-canal (stōn'ka-nal'), n. In echinoderms, the duct leading from the madreporic plate to the circular canal; so called because it ordinarily has calcareous substances in its walls. Also sand-canal. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 220.

stone-cast (stōn'kást), n. The distance which a stone may be thrown by the hand; a stone's cast; a stone's throw.

About a stone-cast from the wall

A sluice with blacken'd waters leapt.

Tennyson, Mariana.

stone-dumb stōn'dūm'), a. Perfectly dumb.
The Century, XXXV, 622. [Rare.]

Synedrella Monarda mercenaria

men.] A pile of rocks roughly laid together, usually on a prominent mountain-peak or ridge, and intended to serve either as a landmark or as a record of a visit; a cairn.

stone-marten (stōn'mär'ten), n. Same as hutch-marten.

stone-mason (stōn'mā'sn), n. One who dresses stones for building, or builds with them; a builder in stone.

stone-merchant (stōn'mēr'chant), n. A dealer in stones, especially building- or paving-stones.

stone-mill (stōn'mil), n. 1. A machine for breaking or crushing stone; a stone-breaker; an ore-crusher. See cut under stone-breaker.

—2. A stone-dresser. See stone-dresser, 2.

stone-mint (stōn'mint), n. The American dittany. See Canila.

stone-mortar (stōn'mōr'tär), n. A form of mortar used for throwing projectiles of irregular and varying form, such as stones.

stonen (stō'nem), a. [< ME. stouen, also stenu, < AS. stāwn, of stone, < stān, stone; see stone and *-en*².] Consisting or made of stone. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

He forsothe areride a stonen signe of worship.

Wyeliff, Gen. xxxv. 14.

stone-oak (stōn'ōk), n. An oak, Quercus Javensis, found in Java and other islands; so named from its thick osseous nut, which is peculiar among acorns in being ridged, with the cupule fitting into the furrows.

stone-oil (stōn'oil), n. Rock-oil or petroleum.

stone-owl (stōn'oul), n. The Acadian or saw-whet owl, Nyctala acadica, which sometimes hides in quarries or piles of rock. See cut under Nyctala. [Pennsylvania.]

stone-parsley (stōn'pārs'li), n. The plant Sison Anomum; also, Seseli Libanotis and other species of the genus Seseli. See Seseli.

stonepecker (stōn'pek'ēr), n. 1. The turnstone, Streptopus interpres. See cut under turnstone. [Local, Great Britain.] —2. The purple sandpiper, Tringa purpurina, a bird of similar resorts and habits. [Shetland Islands.]

stone-pine (stōn'pin), n. See pinel, also oil-tree, 5, and pignon, 1.

stone-pit (stōn'pit), n. A pit or quarry where stones are dug.

stone-pitch (stōn'pich), n. Hard inspissated pitch.

stone-plover (stōn'pluv'ēr), n. 1. The stone-curlew, thick-kneed plover, or thick-knee, a charadriomorph or plover-like wading bird of the family Edicnemidae, Edicnemus crepitans, a common bird of Europe. See cut under Edicnemus. —2. Hence, one of various limicoline birds of the plover and snipe families. (a) The Swiss, gray, or bullhead plover, Squatarola helvetica. See cut under Squatarola. (b) The ring-plover, Egialites hiaticula, or the dotterel, Eudromias morinellus; a stone-runner. See cuts under Egialites and dotterel. (c) A shore-plover of the genus Esacus, as E. recurvirostris. (d) The bar-tailed godwit, Limosa lapponica. See cut under Limos. (e) The whimbrel, Nanenus phaeopus.

stone-pock (stōn'pok), n. A hard pimple which suppurates; acne.

stone-priest (stōn'prēst), n. A lascivious priest. Grin the Collier. (Davies.)

stoner (stō'nēr), n. [< stone + *-er*¹.] One who or that which stones, in any sense of that word.

stone-rag (stōn'rag), n. A lichen, Parmelia saxatilis.

stone-ray (stōn'rā), n. 1. Same as stone-ray. —2. The turnstone, Streptopus interpres. [Armagh, Ireland.]

stoner (stō'nēr), a. [Var. of stonen.] Consisting or made of stone. [Scotch.]

The West Port is of stonern work, and mair decorated with architecture and the policy of bigging.

Scott, Fortunes of Nigel, ii.

stone-roller (stōn'rō'lēr), n. Same as stone-lugger.

stone-root (stōn'rōt), n. See horse-balm and heal-all.

stone-rue (stōn'rō), n. The fern Asplenium Ruta-muraria. [Eng.]

stone-runner (stōn'rūn'ēr), n. Same as stone-plover, 2 (b). [Prov. Eng.]

stone-saw (stōn'sā), n. A tool or a sawing-machine for cutting marble, millstones, and building-stones into slabs, disks, columns, and blocks, either from the live rock in the quarry or in a stone-yard. The most simple form of machine is a flat blade of iron strained tight in a saw-frame, and reciprocated by means of suitable mechanism. The cutting is done by particles of sand continually supplied to the saw by means of a stream of water. Stone-saws of this type are usually arranged in gangs, the frame supporting a number of saws, and being suspended by chains over the block to be cut, the spaces between the blades regulating the thickness of the slabs. Circular saws have also been used to cut thin slabs of stone into narrow pieces by the agency of wet sand. An improvement on this method is the use of circular saws armed with black diamonds or carbon points. The saw is placed in a frame resembling an iron-planer, the saw-arbor having a vertical motion; and the block of stone, dogged to a traversing table, is fed to the saw as the cut is made. Diamond stone-cutting machines have also been made in the form of reciprocating saws. In one new stone-sawing machine, called a channeling-machine, used to cut out large blocks and columns in a quarry, a circular saw having carbon points is employed, the power being applied by means of gearing to the edge of the saw instead of at the arbor. Another form of quarrying stone-saw consists of an endless band of twisted wire rope passing in a horizontal direction over large pulleys, like a hand-saw, and employing wet sand as the cutting-material.

stone's-cast (stōnz'kást), n. Same as stone-cast.

stonesed (stōn'séd), n. A plant of the genus Lithospermum, particularly the gromwell, L. officinale and L. arvense. The name, as also that of the genus, refers to the hardness of the seeds.

Stonesfield slate. See slate, 2.

stone-shot (stōn'shot), n. The distance a stone can be thrown, either from a cannon or from a sling.

He show'd a tent
A stone-shot off.
Tennyson, Princess, v.

Mrs. Campbell Praed, The Head Station, p. 25.

stoneware (stōn'wār), n. Potters' ware made from clay of very silicious nature, or a composition of clay and flint. The clay is beaten in water and purified, and the flint is calcined, ground, and suspended in water, and then mixed (in various proportions for various wares) with the clay. The mixture is then dried in a kiln until it is sufficiently solid to be kneaded, and is then beaten and tempered before being molded into shape. When fired it is not porous, like common pottery, but vitrified through its whole substance in consequence of the great amount of silica contained in the prepared clay. Vessels of stoneware are generally glazed by means of common salt. The salt, being thrown into the furnace, is volatilized by heat, becomes attached to the surface of the ware, and is decomposed, the muriatic acid flying off and leaving the soda behind it to form a fine thin glaze on the ware, which resists ordinary acids. The old German stoneware had often a vitreous glaze. See gres de Gandres, under gres, and Cologne ware, under ware, 2.

stool-ball (stöl'bäl), n. An outdoor game of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, generally played by women alone, but sometimes in company with men. See second quotation. Dough. Will you go with me? Worce. What shall we do there, wench? Dough. Why, play at stool-ball. Fletcher (and another), Two Noble Kinsmen, v. 2.

Stool-ball. This game, so often mentioned in old writers, is still played in almost every village in Sussex, and is for ladies and girls exactly what cricket is to men. Two pieces of board 18 inches by 12 are fixed to two sticks from 3 to 4 feet high, according to the age of the players. These sticks are stuck in the ground sloping a little backwards, and from 10 to 15 yards apart. The players take sides, generally eight to ten each. . . . The bowler pitches the ball at the board, which in fact is the wicket. If he hits it the player is out. The same is the case if the ball is caught; and the running out, stumping, &c., are exactly like cricket. N. and Q., 3d ser., XI. 457.

stool-pigeon (stöl'pīj'on), n. 1. A pigeon fastened to a stool, and used as a decoy.

The Stool-Pigeon, also, as familiar to English ears as to ours, exists here—and even in the Eastern States—still in both its primary signification and its figurative extension. In the former it means the pigeon, with its eyes stitched up, fastened on a stool, which can be moved up and down by the hidden fowler, an action which causes the bird to flutter anxiously. This attracts the passing flocks of wild pigeons, which alight and are caught by a net, which may be sprung over them. De Vere, Americanisms, p. 210.

Hence—2. A person employed as a decoy; as, a stool-pigeon for a gambling-house; such a fellow is generally a "rook" who pretends to be a "pigeon." See pigeon, 2, and rook, 3.

The bendings, and the falls.

E. Johnson, Sejanus, i. 1.

His clumsy figure, which a great stoop in his shoulders, and a ludicrous habit he had of thrusting his head forward, by no means redeemed.

Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, ii.

2. The darting down of a bird on its prey; a swoop; a pounce.

Once a kite, hovering over the garden, made a stoop at me. Sirry, Gulliver's Travels, ii. 5.

Hence—3. That which stoops or swoops; a hawk. [Rare.]

You glorious martyrs, you illustrious stoops,

That once were cloister'd in your fleshy coops.

Quarles, Emblems, v. 10.

4. A descent from superiority, dignity, or power; a condescension, concession, or submission; as, a polite stoop.

De'il blin' them wi' the stör o't.

Burns, Awa', Whigs, Awa'.

3. A gush of water. Jamieson; Halliwel (under stour, stoure). [Scotch.]—4. Spray. [Scotch.]—5. A sufficient quantity of yeast for brewing. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

stoor⁴, n. A Middle English form of *store*³.

stoorey (stō'ri), n. [Cf. *stoer*², n. 5.] A mixture of warm beer and oatmeal stirred up with sugar. [Prov. Eng.]

stoorness (stōr'nes), n. [Also stourness; < ME. stourness, stourness; < *stoer*¹ + -ness.] Strength; power.

And Troiell, the tru knight, traytury he slogh, Noght thurgh stourness of strokes, ne with strenght one.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 10345.

stoory (stō'ri), a. [Also stoury, stoury; < *stoer*², n. 2, + -y¹.] Dusty. [Scotch.]

An aye she took the tither souk,

To dronk the stoerie tow.

Burns, I bought my Wife a Stane of Lint.

stooth (stōth), n. [Early mod. E. stoth; prob. < Icel. stoth = Sw. stod, a post; cf. AS. studu, > ME. stode, E. stud, a post, etc.; see *stud*¹.] A stud; a post; a batten. [Obsolete or provincial.]

For settinge in ij. *stoth*es and mendinge the wall of the receiver's chamber over the sture.

Hovenden Roll (1552), in Fabric Rolls of York Minster, (p. 355). (E. Peacock.)

stoothing (stō'thing), n. [< stooth + -ing¹, or a var. of studding, accom. to stooth.] Studding; battening.

stop¹ (stop), v.; pret. and pp. stopped, ppr. stop- ping. [< ME. stoppen, stoppen, < AS. stoppan (in comp. for-stoppan), stop up, = OS. stop- pan = MD. D. stoppen = MLG. LG. stoppen, stuff, cram, = OHG. stoffon, stoppon, MHG. G. stopfen, stoppen = Icel. Sw. stoppa = Dan. stoppe, stop. (a) According to the usual view, = OF. estouper, F. étouper = OSP. estopar = H. stoppare, stop up with tow, < LL. stupare, stuppare, stop up with tow, cram, stop, < L. stupa, stippa = Gr. στυπή, στίππη, coarse part of flax, hards, oakum, tow; see stupa, *stupa*¹. (b) But this explanation, which suits phonetically, is on grounds of meaning somewhat doubtful; it does not appear from the early instances of the verb that the sense 'stop with tow.' 'stuff' is the original. The similarity with the L. and Rom. forms may be accidental, and the Teut. verb may be different (though mingled with the other), and connected with OHG. stopfōn, MHG. stopfen, stüpfen, pierce, and so ult. with E. stump. Cf. stuff, v., derived, through the F., from the same Teut. source.] I. trans. 1. To close up, as a hole, passage, or cavity, by filling, studding, plugging, or otherwise obstructing; block up; choke: as, to stop a vent or a channel.

There is an eldre thet is y-hote ine latin aspis, thet is of zuiche kende thet hi *stoppe*th thet on eare mid erthe, and thet other mid hare tayle, thet hi ne yhere thane charnere.

Agincourt of Turgt (E. E. T. S.), p. 257.

Imperious Cesar, dead, and turn'd to clay,

Might stop a hole to keep the wind away.

Shak., Hamlet, v. 1. 237.

Mountains of ice, that stop the imagined way,

Beyond Petsora eastward, to the rich

Cathlian coast. Milton, P. L., x. 291.

2. To make close or tight; close with or as with a compressible substance, or a lid or stopper: as, to stop a bottle with a cork; hence, to staunch.

The eldest and wysest at Gehall were they that mended and stopped thy shippes. Bible of 1551, Ezek. xxvii. 9.

Have by some surgeon, Shylock, on your charge,

To stop his wounds, lest he do bleed to death.

Beau. and FL., Knight of Burning Pestle, i. 1.

7. To check or arrest by anticipation.

The grief . . . that stops his answer.

Shak., Lucrece, l. 1664.

Every bold sinner, when about to engage in the commission of any known sin, should . . . stop the execution of his purpose with this question: Do I believe that God has denounced death to such a practice, or do I not?

South, (Johnson.)

8. To keep back; withhold.

Do you mean to stop any of William's wages, about the sack he lost the other day at Hincley fair?

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., v. 1. 24.

Nor stops, for one bad cork, his butler's pay.

Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. ii. 63.

9. To cease from; discontinue; bring to a stop.

When the crickets stopped their cry,
When the owls forbore a term,
You heard music; that was I.

Browning, Serenade at the Villa.

10. In musical instruments: (a) Of the lute and viol classes, to press (a string) with the finger so as to shorten its vibrating length, and thus raise the pitch of the tone produced from it. (b) Of the wind group generally, to close (a finger-hole in the tube) so as to change the nodes of the vibrating column of air, and thus alter the pitch of the tone. (c) Of wind-instruments of the trumpet class, to insert the hand into (the bell) so as to shorten the length of the vibrating column of air, and thus to raise the pitch of the tone.—11. Naut., to make fast with a small line: as, to stop a line to a harpoon-staff.—12. To put the stops, or marks of punctuation, in; point, as a written composition; punctuate.

If his sentences were properly stopped.

Lawlor, (Imp. Dict.)

13. In masonry, plastering, etc., to point or dress over (an imperfect or damaged place in a wall) by covering it with cement or plaster.—14. In hort., same as stop.

After the end of July it is not advisable to continue the topping—technically stopping—of the young shoots.

Encyc. Brit., XII. 254.

15. To ward off; parry. [Pugilistic slang.]—A stopping oyster. See oyster.—Stopping the glass. See glass.—To stop a gap. See gap.—To stop a line. See line.—To stop down a lens, in photog., etc., to reduce the amount of light admitted through a lens by using stops or diaphragms. See stop, n., 12.—To stop off. (a) In founding, to fill in (a part of a mold) with sand to prevent metal from running into that part when the casting is made. The form of the casting can frequently be thus changed without the expense of altering a pattern or making a new pattern. (b) In galvanoplastic operations, to apply a varnish to (parts of a plate or object) to prevent the deposit of metal upon the varnished parts during immersion in the gilding or electroplating solution.—To stop one's mouth, to silence one; especially, to silence one by a sop or bribe.

Let repentance stop your mouth;
Learn to redeem your fault.

Ford, Lover's Melancholy, iv. 1.

If you would have her silent, stop her mouth with that ring.

Wycherley, Gentleman Dancing-Master, v. 1.

To stop out. (a) In the arts, to protect (a surface, etc.) from chemical or other action by covering with a coating: as, in photography, to cover with paint, paper, etc., as parts of a negative which are not to be printed; in electrotyping, to cover with wax, as parts of the black-leaded mold, to prevent the deposit of copper on those parts; in etching, to cover with a varnish or other resisting composition, as parts of a plate which are not to be bitten by the acid. (b) Theat., to cover (some of the teeth) with black wax, so as to make them invisible. = Syn. 1 and 4. To interrupt, block, blockade, barricade, intercept, end.—9. To suspend, intermit.

II. intrans. 1. To check one's self; leave off; desist; stay; halt; come to a stand or stop, as in walking, speaking, or any other action or procedure.

Why stops my lord? shall I not hear my task?

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., iii. 2. 52.

Terence . . . always judiciously stops short before he comes to the downright pathetic.

Goldenith, Sentimental Comedy.

No rattling wheels stop short before these gates.

Cowper, Task, iv. 144.

2. To discontinue; come to an end; cease to be: as, the noise stopped; an annuity stops.—3. To make a halt or a stay of longer or shorter duration; tarry; remain.

We . . . went about half a mile to the east of Tortura, not designing to stop there.

Poecke, Description of the East, II. i. 60.

Mr. Brontë and old Tabby went to bed. . . . But Charlotte . . . stopped up . . . till her weak eyes failed to read or to sew.

Mrs. Gaskell, Charlotte Brontë, II. 121.

"I would rather stop ached," said I; "what have I to do with fighting?"

R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, lxiv.

I've been up country some weeks, stopping with my mother.

S. O. Jewett, Deephaven, p. 17.

4. To intercept, ward off, or parry a blow. [Pugilistic slang.]

Don't stop with your head too frequently.

A. L. Gordon, In Utrunque Paratus.

To stop off or over, to make a brief or incidental stay at some point in the course of a journey; lie off or over: also used as a noun or an adjective: as, a stop-over check; the ticket allows a stop-off in Chicago. (Colloq.)—To stop out, to stay out all night, as in the streets, or away from one's proper lodging-place.

Mr. Hall, at Bow-street, only says, "Poor boy, let him go." But it's only when we've done nothing but stop out that he says that.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, II. 563.

stop¹ (stop), n. [< ME. stoppe, r.] 1. The act of stopping, in any sense. (a) A filling or closing up.

A breach that craves a quick expedient stop!

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 1. 255.

(b) An impeding or hindering; obstruction; stoppage.

What's he? One sent,
I fear, from my dead mother, to make stop
Of our intended voyage.

Brome, Antipodes, i. 7.

(c) A pause; a stand; a halt.

When he took leave now, he made a hundred stops, Desir'd an hour, but half an hour, a minute.

Fletcher, Honourable Lieutenant, iii. 1.

Mrs. Crumple advancing with that stage walk which consists of a stride and a stop alternately.

Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby, xxv.

(d) Termination; ending.

How kingdoms sprung, and how they made their stop,
I well observed.

J. Beaumont, Psyche, ii. 49.

(e) A stay; a tarrying.

Coming to the Corner above Bethlehem Gate, [we] made a stop there, in order to expect the return of our Messenger.

Maunder, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 67.

2f. A state of hesitation or uncertainty; a stand-still.

At which sudden question, Martins was a little at a stop.

Bacon, Holy War.

3. That which stops or hinders; especially, an obstacle or impediment; specifically, a weir.

He that is used to go forward, and findeth a stop, falleth out of his own favour.

Bacon, Empire (ed. 1857).

What they called stops . . . were in effect weirs or kids.

Sir J. Hawkins, in Walton's Complete Angler, p. 274, note.

4. In musical instruments: (a) Of the lute and viol classes, a pressure on a string so as to shorten its vibrating length, and raise the pitch of its tone. (b) Of wind-instruments, the closing of a finger-hole in the tube so as to alter the pitch of its tone. (c) Of wind-instruments of the trumpet class, the inserting of the hand into the bell so as to raise the pitch of the tone.—5. Any lever or similar device for thus stopping a string or finger-hole.

His jesting spirit, which is now crept into a lute-string and now governed by stops.

Shak., Much Ado, iii. 2. 62.

In every instrument are all tones to him that has the skill to find out the stops.

Brome, Sparagus Garden, iii. 4.

6. In an organ, a graduated set of pipes of the same kind, and giving tones of the same quality. A complete stop has at least one pipe for each digital of the keyboard to which it belongs: if a stop has less, it is called a partial stop; if more, it is called a compound stop or mixture stop. The number of pipes constituting a stop varies according to the compass of the keyboard to which it belongs, the usual number being now sixty-one for manual keyboards, and either twenty-seven or thirty for pedal keyboards, while mixture-stops have between twice and five times as many. Stops are variously classified, as follows: (a) As to general quality of tone, the principal qualities recognized being the organ-tone (as in the open diapason, the octave, the fifteenth, etc.), the flute-tone (as in the bourdon, the stopped diapason, the melodia, the flute, etc.), the string-tone (as in the viol da gamba, the viola, the dulciana, etc.), and the reed-tone (as in the oboe, the clarinet, the trumpet, etc.). The first three groups are also called flute-stops, and the last reed-stops, from the construction of their pipes (see pipe, 2). (b) As to the pitch of the tones relative to the digitals used, the two classes being foundation- and mutation-stops, of which the former give tones exactly corresponding to the normal pitch of the digitals, while the latter give tones distant from that pitch by some fixed interval, like one, two, or three octaves, or even a twelfth. Foundation-stops are usually called eight-foot stops, because the length of an open pipe sounding the second C below middle C is approximately eight feet; while for an analogous reason mutation-stops sounding an octave below the normal pitch of the digitals are called sixteen-foot stops; those sounding the octave above, four-foot stops; those sounding the second octave above, two-foot stops, etc. The specific names of stops are not only numerous, but often vary without sufficient reason. Some names have a merely technical significance, as diapason, principal, etc.; some indicate the instrument which they are intended to imitate, as flute, trumpet, violinello, etc.; while others mark the extent of the mutation produced, as octave, twelfth, quint, etc. Each partial organ has its own stops, which can be sounded only by means of the digitals of its own keyboard. The pipes of a stop are usually arranged in a transverse row on the wind-chest, the order of disposition, or plantation, varying somewhat. Under them, and between the upper and middle boards of the chest, is a movable strip of wood called a slider, which (together with both these boards) is perforated with holes corresponding to the plantation of the pipes. The position of the slider is controlled through a system of levers by a handle near the keyboard called a register, stop-knob, or stop. When this handle is pulled out or drawn, the holes of the slider are coincident with those of the two boards, so that the air can pass freely from the pallets into the pipes; when the handle is pushed in, the holes of the slider are not coincident with those of the two boards, and communication between the pallets and the pipes is cut off. In the one case the stop is said to be "on," in the other "off." When the slider controlling the use of the upper pipes of a stop is separated from that controlling the lower, the stop is called divided. Since the handles controlling the use of the pipes or stops proper are made of the same general shape as those controlling various mechanical appliances, like couplers, the former are also called sounding or speaking stops, in distinction from the latter, or mechanical stops. Stops whose quality or power of tone is decidedly individual, so as to fit them for the performance of solo melodies, are called solo stops. See organ, reed-organ, pipe, etc.

The pathetic stop of Petrarch's poetical organ was one he could pull out at pleasure.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 368.

7. Same as stop-knob.—8. pl. In the harpsichord, handles controlling levers by which the position of the jacks could be varied so as to alter the force or quality of the tones produced.

—9. A mark to indicate a stop or pause in reading; a mark of punctuation.

I can write fast and fair

Most true orthography, and observe my stops.

Middleton, More Dissemblers than Women, iii. 2.

Who walked so slowly, talked in such a hurry,
And with such wild contempt for stops and Findley Murray!

C. S. Calverley, Isabel.

10. In joinery, one of the pieces of wood nailed on the frame of a door to form the recess, or rebate into which the door shuts.—11. Naut.: (a) A projection at the head of a lower mast, supporting the trestletrees. (b) A bit of small line used to lash or fasten anything temporarily: as, hammock-stops, awning-stops.—12. In optics, a perforated diaphragm inserted between the two combinations of a double lens, or placed in front of a single lens, to intercept the extreme rays that disturb the perfection of the image. The practical effect of the stop is to increase the depth of the focus and sharpness of definition, but to diminish the illumination in the exact ratio of the diameter of the stop to that of the lens, and hence, in photography, to increase correspondingly the necessary time of exposure.

Microscopes, in which, whatever be the size of the lens itself, the greater portion of its surface is rendered inoperative by a stop.

W. E. Carpenter, Micros., § 16.

13. In bookbinding, a small circular finishing-tool used by bookbinders to stop a line or fillet at its intersection with another line.—14. In lace-manuf., (in the application of the Jacquard attachment described under loom, 2, to a lace-frame), a point at which the different sets of warp-threads are concentrated or brought to a sort of focus, and which in the design of a pattern is taken as a basis for measurement in determining the distances the respective threads in the set must be moved to form the desired pattern. The movements of the mechanism are adjusted in accordance with these measurements.—15. In phonetics, an alphabetic sound involving a complete closure of the mouth-organ; a mute; a check.—16. The convexity of the profile of a dog's face, specially marked in the bulldog and pug.—17. In fencing, the action whereby a fencer, instead of parrying a blow and then thrusting, allows a careless opponent to run on his sword-point. He may hasten the stop by extending the sword-arm. (See stop-thrust.) The stop is discouraged in fencing as a game, since much use of it shortens the passages, and destroys combinations of feints, disengagements, coupes, etc.—Double stop. See single stop.—Full stop. (a) A period. (b) In lute-playing: (1) A chord followed by a pause. (2) A chord in producing which all the strings are stopped by the fingers.—Geneva stop. See Geneva movement, under movement.—Half-stop, in an organ, a stop which contains half, or about half, the full number of stops.—Harmonic stop. See harmonic.—Incomplete or imperfect stop. See incomplete.—Open stop, in organ-building, a stop whose pipes are open at the upper end.—Pedal stop. See pedal.—Service stop, in railroading, a stop made by a railway train, in the regular way and at stations designated by the regulation schedule, as distinguished from an emergency stop.—Single stop, in ship-building, the scoring down of the carlines between the beams, by which means a carline is prevented from sinking any lower than its intended position. The double stop is generally used for deeper carlines than the single stop.—To hunt upon the stop, to hunt with or like a stop-hound—that is, slowly and with frequent pauses; hence, to be lukewarm.

If any [Christian] stop a little forward, do not the rest hunt upon the stop?

Rer. S. Ward, Sermons, p. 91.

To put a stop to, to cause to stop, temporarily or permanently; break off; end.—Syn. 1. Stop, Cessation, Stay, Suspension, Intermission, Pause, Rest. These words may denote the failure or interruption of forward motion or of activity. Stop is an energetic word, but the most general; it is opposed to going forward or going on; cessation may be temporary or final and is opposed to continuance; a stay is a stop viewed as a lingering or delay: as, a short stay in the place; or, as a legal term, simply a stop: as, a stay of proceedings; suspension is a complete but presumably temporary stop: as, a suspension of work or pay; intermission is a strictly temporary stop; pause is a brief stop, in full expectation of going on; rest is a stop for refreshment from weariness.

stop² (stop), n. [< ME. stoppe, < AS. stoppa, a bucket or pail; see stoppe.] A bucket; a pail; a small well-bucket; a milk-pail. Hallucell.

[Prov. Eng.]

stop³, n. A Middle English form of stoppe.

stop-cock (stop'kok), n. A faucet with a valve of some form, operated by a handle: used to open or close a pipe or passage for water, gas, etc. Such cocks are sometimes made self-closing, to prevent waste.

stop-collar (stop'kol är), n. In mach., an adjustable collar which can be placed and held by a set-screw on a shaft or rod as a stop or gage to limit the motion of a movable part sliding on the rod or shaft, as a fitting on the main shaft on which the carriage of a type-writer slides, and adjustments in many other machines.

stop-cylinder (stop'sil'in-dér), n. In printing. See cylinder-press and printing-machine.

stop-drill (stop'drill), n. A form of drill made with a solid shoulder, or admitting of the attachment of a collar by a side-screw, to limit the depth of penetration of the tool.

stope¹ (stóp), n. [*ME. stope = MD. stoep, etc., a step; or a var. of stap, stap, a step (cf. stapen, stapen, pp. of stapen); see step, and cf. stap.] An excavation made in a mine to remove the ore which has been rendered accessible by the shafts and drifts. These are, to a certain extent, permanent constructions, being carefully supported by the necessary timbering and left open for passage, while the stopes are only supported so far as may be necessary for the safety of the mine, and are more or less completely filled up with the attle or refuse rock left behind after the ore has been picked out and sent to the surface.

stope² (stóp), v. t. and i.: pret. and pp. stoped, pp. stoping. [*cf. stope*¹, n.] In mining, to remove the contents of a vein. The stoping is done after a vein or lode has been laid open by means of the necessary shafts and drifts. See stopping.

stope³ (stóp), n. An obsolete form of *stope*².

stope⁴, stopen. Middle English forms of stapen, past participle of step.

stop-finger (stop'fing gér), n. Same as faller-wire, 2.

stop-gap (stop'gap), n. and a. [*cf. stop*¹, v., + obj. gap.] 1. n. That which fills a gap or hiatus, or, figuratively, that which serves as an expedient in an emergency.

I declare off; you shall not make a stop-gap of me.

Fonte, The Cozeners, i. 1.

A good deal of conversation which is . . . introduced as a stop-gap. Proc. Eng. Soc. Psych. Research, XVII, 450.

II. a. Filling a gap or pause, as in the course of talk.

The "well's" and "ah's," "don't-you-know's," and other stop-gap interjections.

Proc. Amer. Soc. Psych. Research, i. 312.

stop-gate (stop'gát), n. A gate used to divide a canal into sections, so that in case of a break in an embankment in one section the water can be shut off from flowing into it from other sections.

stop-hound (stop'hound), n. A dog trained to hunt slowly, stopping at the huntsman's signal. Darvies (under stop).

Sir Roger, being at present too old for fox-hunting, to keep himself in action, has disposed of his beagles and got a pack of stop-hounds. Budgell, Spectator, No. 116.

stopping (stóp'ing), n. [*Verbal n. of stop*¹, v.] In mining, the act of excavating mineral ground to remove the ore after this has been rendered accessible by the necessary preliminary excavations—namely, sinking one or more shafts or winzes and running drifts.—Overhand stopping, a method of working out the contents of a vein by advancing from below upward, the miner being thus always helped by gravity. It is the method most commonly employed. That part of the material thrown down which is worth saving is raised to the surface, and the refuse rock (attle or deads) resting on the stulls remains in the excavation, helping to support the walls of the mine, and giving the miner a place on which to stand.—Underhand stopping, excavating the ore by working from above downward. In underhand stopping everything loosened by blasting has to be lifted up to be got out of the way. The advantage of this method is that in case the ore is very valuable, less of it need be lost by its getting so mixed with the attle that it cannot be picked out.

stop-knob (stop'nób), n. In organ-building, the handle by which the player controls the position of the slider belonging to a particular stop, or set of pipes. When the knob is drawn out, the pipes are ready to be sounded by the keys. The name of the stop is commonly written on the knob. Also called register and stop. See cut under reed-organ.

stopless (stóp'les), a. [*cf. stop*¹ + -less.] Not to be stopped or checked. [Rare.]

Making a civil and staid senate rude

And stopless as a running multitude.

Sir W. Davenant, On King Charles the Second's Return.

stop-motion (stóp'mó shón), n. In mech., a device for automatically arresting the motion of an engine or a machine, when from any cause it is necessary to stop suddenly to prevent injury to the machine or material. Stop-motion mechanisms are applied to looms, spinning, roving, and drawing-machines, winding-machines, elevators, knitting-machines, and engines. They are divided into two classes: those operated by some mechanical means, as a weighted arm resting on the thread of a loom, where the breakage of the thread causes the arm to fall; and those actuated by electricity, in which the fall of an arm closes a circuit, and by means of a magnet sets in motion some mechanical device for arresting the motion. In most machines the usual method is the shifting of the belt that moves the machine. In engines the stoppage and fall of the governor closes the steam-valve. Electrical stop-motion appliances, not self-acting, are sometimes used; in case of a break-down the use of a push-button releases a weight that by suitable mechanism shuts off steam from the engine. Fork-and-grid stop-motion, in a power-loom, a stop-motion in which a grid on the batten acts in connection with a fork, which when the web-thread breaks causes a lever to drop and stops the loom.

stop-net (stóp'net), n. An addition to the main net in seine-fishing. Encyc. Brit., IX, 254.

stop-order (stóp'ór'dér), n. In stock-broking, an order given by a person to his broker to sell or buy a specified stock when the price reaches a specified figure.

stop-over (stóp'ó'vér), n. and a. See to stop off or over, under *stop*¹, v. i.

stoppage (stóp'áj), n. [*cf. stop*¹ + -age.] 1. The act of stopping, in any sense, or the state of being stopped; especially, a stopping of motion or procedure.

His majesty, . . . finding unexpected stoppage, tells you he now looks for a present proceed in his affairs.

Court and Times of Charles I., I, 341.

2. A deduction made from pay or allowances to repay advances, etc.—Stoppage in transit or in transitu, in law, the act of a seller of goods who has sent them on their way to the buyer, in reclaiming them before they have come into the actual possession or control of the buyer, and terminating or suspending performance of the sale: a right allowed in case of discovering the buyer to be insolvent.

stopper, n. [ME., < AS. stoppa, a vessel; see *stoop*².] A pail or bucket. Prompt. Parv., p. 477; Hallivell.

stopped (stóp't), p. a. 1. In playing musical instruments, noting the effect produced by stopping in any of the senses described under *stop*¹, v. t., 10.—2. In an organ, having the upper end plugged: said of a pipe; opposed to open. The tone produced by a stopped pipe is an octave lower than that produced by an open pipe of the same length.—Stopped diapason, in organ-building. See diapason (c).—Stopped note. See *note*¹.

stopper¹, n. An obsolete form of stopple.

stopper², n. Same as estoppel.

Abatements, stoppers, inhibitions.

Marston, Scourge of Villanie, vii. 57.

stopper (stóp'ér), n. [*cf. stop*¹ + -er.] 1. One who or that which stops or plugs. (a) one who fills up holes or openings.

The ancients of Gheal and the wise men thereof were in thee thy calkers [margin: stoppers of chinks].

Ezek. xxvii. 9.

(b) That which closes or fills up (an opening, etc.) as a plug, a bung, or a cork; especially, such an article for the mouth of a fruit-jar, decanter, or vial, when made of the same material as the vessel itself, and having no special name, as cork, bung, etc.; a stopple; specifically, a device for closing bottles for aerated water. See cut under siphon-bottle. (c) A convenient utensil made of wood, bone, ivory, or the like, formerly used to compress or pack some loose or flocculent substance into small compass.

I sold little bone "tobacco-stoppers"—they're seldom asked for now; stoppers is quite out of fashion.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I, 490.

(d) One who or that which brings to a stop or stand; specifically, one of the players in tennis, football, and other games, who stops the balls. Hallivell. (e) Naut., a piece of rope secured at one end to a bolt or the like, used to check the motion of another rope or of a cable. Stoppers for cables are of various construction, such as an iron clamp with a lever or screw, a claw of iron with a rope attached, etc. (f) In an organ, a wooden plug inserted in the tops of certain kinds of pipes, as in those of the stopped diapason, flute, bourdon, etc., whence they are called stopped pipes. Such pipes are tuned by means of the stopper. (g) In a vehicle, a bar of wood with iron points pivoted to the body, and allowed to trail on the ground behind to serve as a stop or brake in ascending steep grades. Such a device is used, for instance, on ice-carts plying on hilly streets, where stoppages are frequent.

2. The upper pad or principal callosity of the sole of a dog's foot.

The leg, or bones below the knee [of the greyhound], should be of good size, the stopper (or upper pad) well united to it, and firm in texture.

Dogs of Great Britain and America, p. 45.

3. A small tree of one of four species of the genus Eugenia occurring in Florida. Of the species E. buxifolia is the gurgon or Spanish stopper, E. multiclada is the white stopper, and E. proserpa is the red stopper. The last is somewhat abundant, and has a very heavy, hard, strong, and close-grained wood of a light yellowish-brown color, likely to be valuable for cabinet-making and coarse engraving. The remaining species so called is E. longipes, a rare tree bearing a small red fruit with the flavor of cranberries. All except the last are found also in the West Indies. Sargent.—Cat-head stopper. See cat-head.—Spanish stopper. See def. 3. (See also fighting stopper.)

stopper (stóp'ér), v. t. [cf. stopper, n.] 1. To close or secure with a stopple: as, stoppered bottles.—2. To fit with a stopple or stopples.

The mouth of the vessel to be stoppered is ground by an iron cone fixed to a lathe.

H. J. Powell, Glass-making, p. 73.

3. Naut., to secure with a stopper or stoppers.—To stopper a cable, to put stoppers on a cable to prevent it from running out of the ship when riding at anchor.

stopper-bolt (stóp'ér-hólt), n. Naut., a large ring-bolt driven into the deck before the main hatch, etc., for securing the stoppers.

stopper-hole (stóp'ér-hól), n. In iron-puddling, a hole in the door of the furnace through which the metal is stirred. See cut under puddling-furnace.

stopper-knot (stóp'ér-not), n. A knot in the end of a rope-stopper made by double-walling the strands.

stopping (stóp'ing), n. [*Verbal n. of stop*¹, v.]

1. The act of one who or that which stops, in any sense. Specifically—(a) The process of filling cracks or fissures, as in an oil-painting, with a composition preparatory to restoring; also, the material used in the process.

The stopping, as this mixture [of size and whiting] is called, is pressed into the cracks by means of a palette-knife.

Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 127.

(b) In etching. See to stop out (a), under *stop*¹, v. t. (c) The act or process of altering the pitch of the tones of a musical instrument in any of the ways described under *stop*¹, v. t., 10.

2. Something that stops. Specifically—(a) In mining, any solid wall or brattice built across a passage in a mine, to shut out the air from the goaves, or to limit it to certain passages, or to keep the gas confined, or for any other purpose. (b) In dental surg., material for filling cavities in teeth. (c) In farriery, a ball or pad for stuffing the space in a horse's foot within the inner edge of the shoe.—Double stopping, in viol playing, the act or process of producing tones simultaneously from two stopped strings.

stopping-brush (stóp'ing-brush), n. 1. In hat-making, a brush used to sprinkle boiling water upon the napping and the hat-body to assist in uniting them.—2. In etching, a camel's-hair brush used in stopping out parts of etched plates.

stopping-coat (stóp'ing-kót), n. The covering of resistant material applied to any part of an object about to be exposed to the action of an acid or other agent, in order to protect that part from such action.

stopping-knife (stóp'ing-nif), n. A knife used in stopping, as a glaziers' putty-knife.

stop-plank (stóp'plangk), n. One of the planks employed to form a sort of dam in some hydraulic works. They generally occupy vertical grooves in the wing walls of a lock or weir, to hold back water in case of temporary disorder of the lock-gates.

stop-plate (stóp'plát), n. An end-bearing for the axle in a railroad journal-box, designed to resist end-play of the axle.

stopple¹ (stóp'l), n. [cf. ME. stoppel, stoppell, stopell; < stop + -el, now -le, a noun-formative indicating the instrument (as also in whittle, strangle, etc.).] 1. That which stops or closes the mouth of a vessel; a stopper: as, a glass stopple; a cork stopple.

Item, j. litill botell, with j. cheyne and j. stopell, weying xxxviij. unces.

Paston Letters, i. 472.

Who knows, when he openeth the stopple, what may be in the bottle?

B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, ii. 1.

2. A plug sometimes inserted in certain finger-holes of a flute or flageolet to accommodate its scale to some unusual series.

stopple² (stóp'l), v. t.: pret. and pp. stoppled, pp. stoppling. [*cf. stopple*¹, n.] To stop or close with a stopple.

His hours of study clos'd at last,

And finish'd his concise repast,

Stoppled his cruise, replac'd his book

Within its customary nook.

Courper, Moralizer Corrected.

stopple³ (stóp'l), n. [cf. ME. stoppl, stouple; a more orig. form of stubble: see stubble.] Stubble. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

And thou haubert and ys coler, that nere nothyng souple,
He smot of ys heved as lygtyche as yt were a lute stouple.

Robert of Gloucester, p. 223.

stop-ridge (stóp'rij), n. A band slightly elevated upon the surface of a blade or a similar part of an implement, intended to stop and hold it in the proper place, as in the handle. In stone celts the presence of such a stop-ridge marks a certain class or category.

stop-rod (stóp'ród), n. In weaving, the rod which extends longitudinally under the batten of a loom, forming a part of the stop-motion, and which raises a catch that, if not raised, engages mechanism which immediately stops the loom. Every time the shuttle enters the shuttle-box fairly it acts upon a stop-rod to cause the stop-rod to lift the catch; but, if the shuttle is stopped in its course through the shed, the catch is not raised, the loom is stopped, and the warp, which would otherwise be broken by the impact of the reed against the shuttle while in the shed, is thus saved.

stop-ship (stop'ship), n. [< stop¹, v., + obj. ship; a translation of the Gr. ἐπὶ πλοῖοις, the remora: see Echeneis, and cf. mora, remora.] The fish remora.

O Stop-ship, . . . tell vs where thou doo'st thine Anchors hide;

Whence thou resistest Sayls, Owers, Wind, and Tide, Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 5.

stop-thrust (stop'thrust), n. In fencing, a slight thrust at one's opponent, instead of a parry, made after he has begun to lunge forward in an attack. The stop-thrust goes over by delicate gradations into the time-thrust, but is not considered by fencers a fine blow like the time-thrust.

stop-valve (stop'valv), n. 1. In hydraul., a valve which closes a pipe against the passage of fluid. It is usually a disk which occupies a chamber above the pipe when the passageway through the latter is open, and is driven down by a screw to stop the aperture.

2. In steam-engines, a valve fitted to the steam-pipes, where they leave the several boilers, in such a way that any boiler may be shut off from the others and from the engines.

stop-watch (stop'woch), n. A watch which records small fractions of a second, and in which the hands can be stopped at any instant, so as to mark the exact time at which some event occurs; chiefly used in timing races.

He suspended his voice in the epilogue a dozen times, three seconds and three fifths by a stop-watch, my lord, each time.
Sterne, Tristram Shandy, iii. 12.

stop-water (stop'wā'tēr), n. [< stop¹, v., + obj. water.] 1. Naut., a drag.—2. A plug of soft wood driven tightly into a hole at the joint of a scarf, the expansion of which, when immersed, prevents water from working up through the scarf and behind the bottom plank. In building iron ships a piece of canvas covered with red lead is used to make water-tight joints where caulking is difficult.

stop-wheel (stop'hwēl), n. See Geneva movement, under movement.

stop-work (stop'wērk), n. A device attached to the barrel of a watch, musical box, etc., to prevent overwinding.

stor¹, a. A Middle English form of stoor¹.

stor², n. [ME., < AS. stōr, incense, storax (= W. ystor, resin, rosin), < L. storax, storax: see storax.] Incense.

That Stor signified Gode werkes, for ase se smech of the store wanne hit is i-d into the uerée and goth upward to the heuene and to Gode warde Swa ammetul si gode biddinge to gode of the herte of the gode cristenmanne.
Old Eng. Misc. (ed. Morris), p. 28.

storable (stōr'a-bl), a. [< stor³ + -able.] Capable of being stored. R. S. Ball, Exper. Mechanics, p. 262.

storage (stōr'āj), n. [< stor³ + -age.] 1. The act of storing, in any sense; specifically, the keeping of goods in a store, warehouse, or other place of deposit.—2. The price charged or paid for keeping goods in a storehouse.—Cold storage, storage in refrigerating chambers or other places artificially cooled, as for the preservation of articles liable to be damaged by heat.—Storage battery. See battery.—Storage magazine. Same as magazine, 1 (a).—Storage warehouse. See warehouse.

storage-bellows (stōr'āj-bel'ōz), n. See organ¹, 6.

storax (stō'raks), n. [= F. storax, styrax, < L. storax, styrax, < Gr. στύραξ, a sweet-smelling resin so called, also a tree producing it.] 1. A solid resin resembling benzoin, with the fragrance of vanilla, formerly obtained from a small tree, Styrax officinalis, of Asia Minor and Syria. It was in use from ancient times down to the close of the last century, but has disappeared from the market, the trees having been mostly reduced to bushes by excessive lopping.

This, that, and ev'ry thicket doth transpire
More sweet than storax from the hallowed fire.
Herrick, Apparition of his Mistress.

2. The tree yielding storax, or some other tree or shrub of the same genus. Among the American species, Styrax Californica is a handsome Californian shrub. See cut in next column.—Liquid storax, a balsam known from ancient times with the true storax, obtained by boiling and pressing from the inner bark of the Oriental sweet-gum tree, Liquidambar orientalis, itself also called liquidambar. It is a semi-fluid adhesive substance with the properties of a stimulant expectorant, but now scarcely used in Western practice except as a constituent in the compound tincture of benzoin (resembling friars' balsam: see benzoin) and as an application for itch. It has long been used in making incense and fumigating preparations, and also enters into perfumery. Its chief markets are China and India. A similar balsam is obtained, chiefly in Burma, from Althya excelsa, known (together with the last) in East Indian commerce as rose-malabar, rasamala, etc. In Formosa and southern China a dry treblethinous resin of the same character is derived from Liquidambar Formosana (a species recently identified). An American Liquidambar, or liquid storax, or a substitute for it, is procured as natural exudation or by incision from the bark Branch with Flowers of Storax (Styrax Calyciflora), a, a leaf, showing venation of the sweet gum, Liquidambar styraciflua, in the hotter parts of its habitat. It is better known in Europe than in the United States, where it is perhaps most used for making chewing-gum.

Storax liquida [cometh] from Rhodes.

Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 277.

Storax ointment. See ointment.

storax-tree (stō'raks-trē), n. Same as storax, 2.

store¹, a. A Middle English form of stoor¹.

store², v. A Middle English form of stoor².

store³ (stōr), v. t.; pret. and pp. stored, ppr. storing. [< ME. stōren, also astōren, astorien, < OF. estorer, esturer, estaurer, make, build, establish, provide, furnish, store, < L. instaurare, renew, repair, make, ML. also provide, store, *< in, in, to, + staurare, set up, place (found also in restaurare, restore), *< staurus, fixed, = Gr. σταυρός, n., an upright pole, a stake, cross, = Skt. sthāvara, fixed, = AS. stōar, a rudder, etc.; from the root of stand: see stand. Cf. restore, instaurate, etc. Hence store³, n., storage, store², etc.] 1. To provide; furnish; supply; equip; outfit.

No Cytee of the World is so wel stored of Schippes as is that.
Manderlyle, Travels, p. 207.

Her Mind with thousand Virtues stor'd.
Prior, Ode to the King after the Queen's Death, st. 35.
I believe for Greek & Latin there come very few lads so well stored to the University.
William Lloyd, in Ellis's Lit. Letters, p. 188.

2. To stock with provisions; provide; replenish.

Alle thine castles ich habbe wel stored.
Layamon, l. 13412.

Backe to the yle of Alango, where some of vs went a longe . . . to store vs of newe vytayles.
Sir R. Guylford, Hylygrimage, p. 59.

3. To deposit in a store or warehouse for preservation or safe-keeping; warehouse.

Now was stored
In the sweet-smelling granaries all the hoard
Of golden corn.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, l. 393.

4. To lay up in reserve; accumulate; hoard; often with up.

According to Sir W. Thomson a single Faure cell of the spiral form, weighing 165 lbs., can store 2,000,000 foot-pounds of energy.

W. L. Carpenter, Energy in Nature (1st ed.), p. 125.

5t. To restore.

Keppit the fro combranse & fro cold deth,
Storet thee to strenght & thi stythe londes,
And dawly hir distitir of hir fader.
Destruction of Troy (L. E. T. 8), l. 726.

store³ (stōr), n. and a. [< ME. stor, storr, stoor (cf. W. ystor = Gael. stor, < E.), < OF. estore, estoire, estorie, provisions, store, a fleet, navy, army, < ML. staurum (also, after OF., storium), same as instaurum, store, < L. instaurare, renew, restore, ML. also provide, furnish, store; see store³, v.] 1. n. 1. That which is provided or furnished for use as needed; a stock accumulated as for future use; a supply; a hoard; specifically, in the plural, articles, particularly of food, accumulated for a specific object; supplies, as of food, ammunition, arms, or clothing; as, military or naval stores; the winter stores of a family.

He . . . kepte hir to his usage and his store.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 2337.

500 pounds of hard bread, sleeping-bags, and assorted subsistence stores were landed from the floe Schley and Soley, Rescue of Greely, p. 77.

Hence — 2. A great quantity; a large number; abundance; plenty; used with, or archaically without, the indefinite article.

That olde man of pleasing wordes had store.
Spenser, F. Q., I. l. 35.

With store of ladies, whose bright eyes
Rain influence, and judge the prize.
Milton, L'Allegro, l. 121.

3. A place where supplies, as provisions, ammunition, arms, clothing, or goods of any kind, are kept for future use or distribution; a storehouse; a warehouse; a magazine.

Sulphurous and nitrous foam, . . .
Concocted and adjusted, they reduced
To blackest grain, and into store convey'd.
Milton, P. L., vi. 515.

Hence — 4. A place where goods are kept for sale by either wholesale or retail; a shop; as, a book-store; a dry-goods store. See note under shop¹, 2. [U. S. and British colonies.]

Stores, as the shops are called.
Capt. B. Hall, Travels in N. A., l. 8.

Bill of stores. See bill³.—Bonded store. See banded.—Cooperative store. See cooperative.—Fancy store. See fancy.—General-order store, a customs warehouse in which goods are stored temporarily, as unclaimed, or arriving in advance of invoice or transportation papers, or through other like cause of detention. Such goods are obtainable only on a general order.—General store, a store or shop where goods of all ordinary kinds are kept for sale; especially, such a store in a country village or at cross-roads.—In store, laid up; on hand; ready to be produced; as, we know not what the future has in store for us.

I have an hour's talk in store for you.
Shak., J. C., ii. 2. 121.

Marine, ordnance, public stores. See the qualifying words.—Sea-stores, provisions and supplies on shipboard for use at sea. Compare ship stores.—Ship-stores, provisions and supplies for use on board ships at sea or in port: such supplies are sealed, as non-dutiable, by the customs officers.—Small stores, in a man-of-war, a general term embracing tinware, tobacco, soap, razors, brushes, thread, needles, etc., issued and charged to the men by the paymaster.—Subsistence stores. See subsistence.—To set store by. See set¹, v. t., 18.—To tell no store off, to make no account of; set no store by.

I he telle of laxatyves no store,
For they ben veynious, I woot it weel;
I hem diffye, I love hem never a deel.
Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 334.

II. a. 1t. Hoarded; laid up; as, store linen; store fruit.

Of this treasure . . . the gold was accumulated, and store treasure; . . . but the silver is still growing.
Encom. Holy War.

2. Containing stores; set apart for receiving stores or supplies. Compare store-city.—3. Obtained at a store or shop; purchased or purchasable at a shop or store; as, store clothes; store teeth (humorously used for false teeth). This word in rural or frontier use is commonly opposed to home-made, and implies preference; as, stylish store curtains; in town use it is usually opposed to made to order, and implies disparagement; as, clumsy store boots. [Colloq., U. S.]—Store casemate. Same as barrack casemate (which see, under barrack).—Store cattle, lean cattle bought for fattening by squatters who find that they have more grass than the natural increase of their herd requires. [Australia.]

Oh, we are not fit for anything but store cattle; we are all blady grass.
Mrs. Campbell Praed, Head Station, p. 74.

Store pay, payment for country produce, labor, etc., by goods from a store, in lieu of cash; barter. [Rural, U. S.]

See, a girl has just arrived with a pot of butter to trade off for store pay. She wants in exchange a yard of calico, a quarter of tea, . . . and a bottle of rum.

store⁵ (stōr), n. [< F. store, a window-shade, spring-blind, roller-blind, < L. storea, a mat.] A window-shade; the French term used in English for such a shade when of decorative character, especially when of French manufacture.

store-city (stōr'sit'ē), n. In the Old Testament, a city provided with stores of provisions for troops.

He (Solomon) built Tadmor in the wilderness, and all the store cities, which he built in Hamath.
2 Chron., viii. 1.

store-farm (stōr'fārm), n. A stock-farm; a cattle-farm; a sheep-farm. Scott, Heart of Midlothian, xlii. [Scotch.]

store-farmer (stōr'fār mēr), n. Same as stock-farmer. [Scotch.]

storehouse (stōr'hous), n. 1. A house in which things are stored; a building for the storing of grain, food-stuffs, or goods of any kind; a magazine; a repository; a warehouse; a store.

They ne'er cared for us yet; suffer us to famish, and their store-houses crammed with grain.
Shak., Cor., i. l. 83.

2t. A store; a plentiful supply.

And greatly joyed merry tales to faine,
Of which a storehouse did with her remain.

Spenser, F. Q., II. vi. 6.

storekeeper (stôr'kê pēr), n. 1. One who has the care or charge of a store or stores. (a) A shopkeeper. [U. S.] (b) An officer in a dockyard in charge of stores and storehouses: the superintendent of a storehouse in a navy-yard. (c) Milit., a commissioned officer in the United States army who has charge of the military stores at depots and arsenals. A military storekeeper is an officer of the quartermaster's department; an ordnance storekeeper, of the ordnance department; an medical storekeeper, of the medical department. These officers have the rank and pay of mounted captains in the army, but are not in the line of promotion. 2. Figuratively, an article in a stock of goods that remains so long on hand as to be unsalable. [Slang, U. S.]

storekeeping (stôr'kê'ping), n. The act of taking charge of stores or a store.

storeman (stôr'man), n.: pl. storemen (-men). 1. A man in charge of stores or supplies: as, the storeman's stock of bolts and screws.—2. A man employed in a storehouse for the work of storing goods.

The question of wages of shifters and store-men has been referred to arbitration.

Weekly Echo, Sept. 5, 1885. (Encyc. Diet.) store-master (stôr'mās'tēr), n. The tenant of a store-farm. [Scotch.]

storer (stôr'ēr), n. [< store + -er]. One who lays up or accumulates a store.

Storeria (stô-rē'ri-ä), n. [NL. (Baird and Girard, 1853), named after Dr. D. H. Storer, an American naturalist.] A genus of harmless colubrine serpents of North America, of the family Colubridæ. Two common species of the United States are S. dekayi, and S. occipitumaculata, the spotted-neck snake.

store-room (stôr'rôm), n. A room set apart for stores or supplies, especially table and household supplies.

Miss Jenkins asked me if I would come and help her to tie up the preserves in the store-room.

Mrs. Gaskell, Cranford, II.

store-ship (stôr'ship), n. A government vessel detailed to carry stores for the use of a fleet or garrison, or to store them in foreign ports.

storey, n. See *story*².

storge (stôr'gē), n. [< Gr. στροφή, natural love or affection, < στέφω, love, as parents their children.] The strong instinctive affection of animals for their young; hence, the attachment of parents for children, or of children for parents; parental or filial love. [Rare and technical.]

In the storge, or natural affections of divers animals to their young ones . . . there appears in the parent manifest tokens of solicitude, skill, and in some cases courage too.

Boyle, Christian Virtuoso, pt. II, aph. viii.

The innocence of infancy . . . is the cause of the love called storge. Swedenborg, Conjugal Love (trans.), § 395.

storial (stô'ri-al), a. [ME. storial, an aphetic form of historial.] 1. Historial.

This is storial sooth, it is no fable.

Chaucer, Good Women, l. 702.

2. Of the nature of a story.

He shal fynde ynowe, grete and smale,
Of storial thyng that toucheth gentillesse,
And eek marvailous and hoodynesse.

Chaucer, Prologue to Miller's Tale, l. 71.

storiated (stô'ri-ä-ted), a. [CF. historiated.] Decorated with elaborate ornamental and illustrative designs, as title-pages of books in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, in which the ornamentation often covered the entire page.

The mania for the acquisition of storiated title-pages has led to the cruel spoliation of thousands of rare old books.

London Art Jour., No. 51, p. 91.

storied¹ (stô'rid), a. [*< story*¹ + -ed]. 1. Celebrated or recorded in story or history; associated with stories, tales, or legends.

To-morrow hurry through the fields
Of Flanders to the storied Rhine!

M. Arnold, Calais Sands.

2. Adorned with scenes from a story, or from history, executed by means of sculpture, painting, weaving, needlework, or other art: as, storied tapestries.

Storied windows, richly dight,
Casting a dim religious light.

Milton, Il Penseroso, l. 159.

Can storied urn, or animated bust,
Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath?

Gray, Elegy.

storied² (stô'rid), a. [Formerly also storeyed; *< story*² + -ed.] Having stories or stages: as, a four-storied building.

storier (stô'ri-ēr), n. [*< story*¹ + -er]. A relater of stories; a story-teller; a historian.

The honeyed rhythm of this melodious storier.

J. Rogers Rees, Poetry of the Period (Bookworm, p. 65).

storify¹ (stô'ri-fī), v. t. [*< story*¹ + L. facere, make, do: see -fy.] To make or tell stories about.

storify² (stô'ri-fī), v. t.: pret. and pp. storified, pp. storifying. [*< story*² + L. facere, make, do: see -fy.] To range, as beehives over and under one another, in the form of stories. Phin., Dict. Apiculture, p. 67. [Rare.]

storiologist (stô-ri-ô'j-ist), n. [< storiology + -ist.] A student or expounder of popular tales and legends; one who is versed in folk-lore. [Recent.]

The resurrection of the roe from its bones will recall to storiologists similar incidents in European and especially Scandinavian and Icelandic folk-lore.

N. and Q., 7th ser., l. 484, note.

storiology (stô-ri-ô'j-ij), n. [*< E. story*¹ + Gr. -λογία, < λόγος, speak: see -ology.] The science of folk-lore; the study of popular tales and legends. [Recent.]

For Chaucer's direct source, it might be well worth while for students of comparative storiology who have leisure . . . to examine these and similar monkish collections of exempla [of the thirteenth century].

N. and Q., 7th ser., l. 485.

stork (stôrk), n. [< ME. stork, < AS. store = D. stork, < OHG. storch, < MHG. G. storch (also OHG. store, MHG. G. dial. stork) = feel. stork = Sw. Dan. stork, a stork; cf. Bulg. strūkū, Bulg. strūk, shtrūk = Serv. shtrūk = Russ. sterka, Russ. sterka = Lith. starks = Lett. starks = Hung. szteray = Albanian sterkok, a stork. The relation of the Teut. to the Slav. and other forms is undetermined. Cf. Gr. στέρκος, a vulture, στέρκος ἐν πάρεσσι, a swan.] A large altricial gallinaceous bird, of the family Ciconiidae and especially of the subfamily Ciconiinae (which see for technical characters). The stork is related to the herons, spoonbills, and ibises, but not very closely to the cranes. There are several species, found in nearly all temperate and tropical regions. They are tall and stately birds, equaling the cranes and larger herons in stature, but are readily distinguished by many technical characters. Storks are wading birds, frequenting the vicinity of water; but some of them become semi-domesticated, and often nest on buildings. Their fidelity and amiability are traditional. They feed chiefly on reptiles (as snakes and lizards), amphibians (as frogs), fishes, mollusks, and worms, but also sometimes capture small quadrupeds and birds. The best-known species is the common white stork of Europe, Ciconia alba; when adult, it is pure-white with black-tipped wings and reddish bill and feet: it is about 3½ feet long, and stands 4 feet high. The black stork of the same country is C. nigra, a rarer species. Various birds of different countries, technically storks, are known by other names, as adjutant, marabou, maguari, jabiru, shell-bird, and vand-bird. See these words, and cuts under adjutant-bird, Ciconiidae, Grallæ, jabiru, openbill, Pelargomorphæ, simbil, and Tantalus.—Black-necked stork, Xenorhynchus astralis, of India and Australia, related to the American jabiru and African saddle-billed stork, the three being often placed in the genus Mycteria.—Black stork. See def.—Episcopal stork, Dissoura episcopus. See cut under Pelargomorphæ.—Giant stork, the adjutant-bird.—Hair-crested stork, Leptoptilus (Craunargus) javanicus, a small and quite distinct species of marabou, related to the adjutant, found in parts of India, Java, Sumatra, etc.—Maguari stork, Eucnemis maguari. See maguari.—Marabou stork. See marabou, and cut under adjutant-bird.—Pouched stork. Same as adjutant-bird.—Saddle-billed stork, Ephippiorhynchus senegalensis. See the generic name.—White-bellied stork, Sphenorhynchus albidus. See cut under simbil.—White stork. See def.

stork-billed (stôrk'bild), a. Having a bill like a stork's, as a kingfisher of the genus Pelargopsis. See cut under Pelargopsis.

stork's-bill (stôrk's'bil), n. 1. A plant of the genus Erodium, particularly the heron's-bill, E. cicutarium (also called hemlock stork's-bill), a low bushy herb with pinnate leaves, a mostly Old World plant, abundantly naturalized in many parts of the United States, perhaps indigenous in the west. See al-filrilla.—2. A plant of the related genus Pelargonium, which includes the geraniums, etc., of gardens.

Flowering Plant of Stork's-bill (Erodium cicutarium). a., one of the carpets.

storm (stôrm), n. [< ME. storm, < AS. storm, storm = OS. MD. D. sturm, < OHG. sturm = MHG. G. sturm = feel. storm = Sw. Dan. storm (not in Goth.; cf. It. stormo, a fight, It. dial. sturm = Pr. estorn = Of. estour, estor, estur (*> E. stour*³, a tumult, stir) = Ir. Gael. stóim = Bret. stourm, a storm, all < Teut.); perhaps, with formative -m, from the root of *stir*¹ (> stir, > stir) or of L. struere, strew: see *stir*¹, *stree*¹.] 1. A disturbance of the normal condition of the atmosphere, manifesting itself by winds of unusual direction or force, or by rain (often with lightning and thunder), snow, or hail, or by several of these phenomena in combination; a tempest: also used with reference to precipitation only, as in hail-storm, thunder-storm, snow-storm. A storm is usually associated with an area of low pressure, and its intensity or violence depends upon the steepness of the density-gradients which produce it. The terms area of low pressure, cyclone, cyclonic storm, and storm are often used interchangeably. In area of low pressure the primary reference is to the state of the barometer, in cyclone it is to the gyratory character of the atmospheric circulation, and in storm to the disturbance of the weather: but each term is extended to include the whole of the attendant phenomena.

And there arose a great storm of wind. Mark iv. 37.

Poor naked wretches, wheresoe'er you are,
That bide the pelting of this pitiless storm.

Shak., Learn, iii. 4. 20.

2. Specifically—(a) Technically, in nautical use, a wind of force 11 on the Beaufort scale, being that in which a man-of-war could carry only storm-staysails. The wind suddenly shifted in a heavy rain squall from SSE. to W., and increased to a storm; at 12 noon the barometer read lowest, and the wind was blowing a storm.

Monthly Weather Review (1887), p. 40.

(b) A fall of snow. (c) A prolonged frost. [Prov. Eng.] Hence, figuratively—3. A tempestuous flight or descent of objects fiercely hurled: as, a storm of missiles.

No drizzling shower.

But rattling storm of arrows barb'd with fire.

Milton, P. L., vi. 546.

4. A violent disturbance or agitation of human society; a civil, political, or domestic commotion; a tumult; a clamor.

I will stir up in England some black storm Shall blow ten thousand souls to heaven or hell.

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 1. 349.

5. A destructive or overwhelming calamity; extremity of adversity or disaster.

Having passed many bitter brunts and blasts of vengeance, they dread no storms of Fortune.

Spenser, Shep. Cal., February, Emblem.

An old man, broken with the storms of state.

Shak., Hen. VIII., iv. 2. 21.

6. A vehement or passionate outbreak, as of some emotion, or of the expression of such emotion: as, a storm of indignation; a storm of applause; a storm of hisses.

Mark'd you not how her sister
Began to scold and raise up such a storm?

Shak., T. of S., i. 1. 177.

Her bosom shaken with a sudden storm of sighs.

Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

7. Milit., a violent assault on a fortified place or strong position; a dashing attempt by troops to capture a fortified place, as by scaling the walls or forcing the gates.

How by storm the walls were won,
Or how the victor sacked and burnt the town.

Dryden.

Cyclonic storm, one that accompanies or is caused by a cyclone.—Electric storm. See electric.—Eye of a storm, the calm region at the center of a violent cyclonic storm, where the clouds clear away and blue sky appears—occurring mostly in the tropics, but also experienced more or less perfectly in higher latitudes. This phenomenon is due to the circumstance that the winds immediately bordering the central area blow circularly around it, leaving a region of calm. The centrifugal force of the wind intensifies the diminution of pressure, and develops a tendency toward a gently descending current from above, and a consequent clearing of the sky.—High-area storm, a storm associated with an area of high pressure.—Low-area storm. Same as cyclonic storm.—Magnetic, revolving, etc., storm. See the adjectives.—Storm and stress [a translation of the German Sturm und Drang], a name given to a period in German literary history (about 1770 to 1790) influenced by a group of younger writers whose works were characterized by passion and reaction from the old methods; hence, a proverbial phrase for unrest or agitation.—To take by storm. (a) Milit., to carry by assault. See def. 7.

The recollection of the victory of Roanoke imparted to the Federals that assurance which is a great element of success; they knew that a battery could be taken by storm.

Comte de Paris, Civil War in America (trans.), l. 587.

(b) To captivate or carry away by surprising or delighting: as, the new singer has taken the town by storm.—Wind-storm, a storm with heavy wind, without precipitation. = Syn. 1. Tempest, etc. See *wind*².

storm (stôrm), v. [< ME. stormen, sturmen, < AS. styrmān = D. MLG. LG. stormen = OHG. sturman, MIIG. G. stürmen = Icel. styrmā = Sw. storma = Dan. storme, storm; cf. It. stormire, make a noise, stormeggiare, ring the storm-bell, throng together; from the noun.] 1. intrans. 1. To blow with great force; also, to rain, hail, snow, or sleet, especially with violence; used impersonally: as, it storms.—2. To fume; seold; rage; be in a violent agitation or passion; raise a tempest.

The Dolphin then, discharging Land (at last),
Storms with himself for hauling made such haste.
Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 5.

When . . . I see a gentleman lose his money with serenity, I recognise in him all the great qualities of a philosopher. If he storms and invokes the gods, I lament that he is not placed at the head of a regiment.
Steele, Guardian, No. 174.

3. To move with violence; rush angrily or impetuously: as, he stormed about the room.

Bobby Wick stormed through the tents of his Company.
R. Kipling, Only a Subaltern.

II. trans. To attack and attempt to take possession of, as by scaling walls or forcing gates or breaches; assault: as, to storm a fortified town: often used figuratively.

With eager warmth they fight, ambitions all
Who first shall storm the breach, or mount the wall.
Addison, To the King.

storm-area (stôrm'ā-rē-ā), n. The area covered by a storm; the region within the closed isobars surrounding a center of low pressure. In the United States this region is generally an oval whose length is, on the average, nearly twice its width. Its longest diameter may be turned in any azimuth, but is most frequently directed to a point between north and north 60° east. Over the ocean storm-areas are generally nearly circular.

storm-beat, storm-beaten (stôrm'bēt, -bē'tn), a. Beaten or damaged by storms.

storm-belt (stôrm'bēlt), n. A belt of maximum storm-frequency. On charts containing a large number of storm-tracks the paths are found to be mostly divided into several well-defined groups whose loci form natural storm-belts. In the United States three storm-belts are distinguished: (1) that of storms which appear in the northwest British provinces, advance eastward to the lake region, and thence down the St. Lawrence valley; (2) that of storms which originate in the southwest near the Gulf of Mexico, and move northeastward to the lakes; (3) that of the West India hurricanes, which first move westerly, and then northeastward along the Atlantic coast. Over Europe three storm-belts may be distinguished: one lying across the northern Mediterranean, one across the North Sea and the Baltic, and one northeast and southwest off the coast of Norway and the British Isles. Also called storm-zone.

storm-bird (stôrm'bērd), n. 1. A petrel; one of the birds of the family Procellariidae, including the albatrosses, fulmars, etc., as well as those to which the name petrel is more commonly applied; specifically, the stormy petrel. See cut under petrel.—2. A bird that indicates or seems to foretell bad weather by its cries or other actions, as a storm-cock. Compare rain-bird.

storm-bound (stôrm'bōund), a. Confined or delayed by storms; relating to hindrance by storms: as, we were storm-bound in port.

Weeks of storm-bound inactivity.
Carlyle, To John Carlyle, Feb. 11, 1830.

storm-card (stôrm'kârd), n. A transparent card containing lines to represent the wind-directions in all quarters of a cyclonic storm: devised by Reid as an aid to seamen in avoiding dangerous storms. When the card is drawn to suitable scale, and placed over the position of a vessel on a chart, so that the observed wind-direction and the same wind-direction on the card are brought into coincidence, the bearing of the center of the card from the point of observation indicates the direction of the center of the storm. Knowing the direction of the storm-center, its probable path can be laid down with considerable precision, and the best course for the vessel may then be determined. It is now known that a storm-card cannot universally be used to discover the bearing of a storm-center, for the angle between the wind and the radius varies in different latitudes, and is different at different distances from the center. Also called storm-circle, storm-compass.

storm-center (stôrm'sen'tēr), n. The position of lowest pressure in a cyclonic storm. In the typical case the wind throughout the storm-area blows spirally inward toward the storm-center, changing from a radial to an approximately circular path, and increasing in force as the center is approached. The center itself is an area of comparative calm, accompanied by a partial or complete clearing away of the clouds, and a mild temperature. (See eye of a storm, under storm.) Violent ocean storms frequently exemplify this typical description; but in land storms, which present irregularities of all kinds, these conditions are in general only partially realized.

storm-circle (stôrm'sēr'kl), n. Same as storm-card.

storm-cloud (stôrm'kloud), n. A cloud that brings or threatens storm.

storm-cock (stôrm'kok), n. 1. The fieldfare, Turdus pilaris; also, the mistlethrush, T. viscivorus.

Its song . . . it [the mistle] begins . . . very early in the spring, often with the new year, in blowing showery weather, which makes the inhabitants of Hampshire call it the storm-cock. Pennant, Brit. Zool. (ed. 1776), l. 302.

2. The green woodpecker, Geococcyx viridis. [Prov. Eng. in all uses.] storm-compass (stôrm'kum'pas), n. Same as storm-card.

storm-cone (stôrm'kōn), n. A cone consisting of tarred canvas extended on a frame 3 feet high and 3 feet wide at the base, used either alone or along with the drum as a storm-signal. See cut under storm-signal. [Eng.] storm-current (stôrm'kur'ent), n. A surface sea-current produced by the force of the wind in a storm. Such a current frequently outruns its generating storm, and affords the first announcement thereof on a distant shore by increasing there the intensity of the usual current or by changing its set.

storm-door (stôrm'dōr), n. An outer or additional door for protection against inclement weather: in general used temporarily, for the winter only.

storm-drum (stôrm'drum), n. A cylinder of tarred canvas extended on a hoop 3 feet high and 3 feet wide, hoisted in conjunction with the cone as a storm-signal. See storm-signal. [Eng.] stormer (stôrm'ēr), n. [< storm + -er.] One who storms; specifically (milit.), a member of an assaulting party.

storm-finch (stôrm'finch), n. See finch, and cut under petrel.

storm-flag (stôrm'flag), n. See storm-signal.

stormful (stôrm'fūl), a. [< storm + -ful.] Abounding with storms.

They know what spirit brews the stormful day.
Collins, Ode on the Popular Superstitions of the Highlands.

stormfulness (stôrm'fūl-nes), n. The state of being stormful; stormy character or condition. [Coleridge.] storm-glass (stôrm'glās), n. A hermetically sealed tube containing an alcoholic solution of camphor, together with crystals of nitrate of potash and ammonium chloride: so named because an increase in the amount of the precipitate was supposed to indicate the approach of stormy weather. The changes in the amount of the precipitate are due solely to variations of temperature, and the instrument is simply a chemical thermometer.

storm-house (stôrm'hous), n. A temporary shelter for men employed in constructing or guarding railroads, or other works in exposed situations.

stormily (stôrm'i-lī), adv. In a stormy manner; tempestuously.

storminess (stôrm'i-nes), n. The state of being stormy, or of being agitated or visited by violent winds; tempestuousness; impetuousness; violence.

storming-party (stôrm'ing-pār'tī), n. Milit., the party to whom is assigned the duty of making the first assault in storming an enemy's works.

storm-kite (stôrm'kit), n. A device, on the principle of a kite, for carrying a rope from a ship to the shore in a storm.

stormless (stôrm'les), a. [< storm + -less.] Free from storms; without storm.

Our waking thoughts
Suffer a stormless shipwreck in the pools
Of sullen slumber. Tennyson, Harold, v. l.

storm-pane (stôrm'pān), n. An extra square of glass fitted in a frame provided with clamps, used to fit over a window in an exposed building, as a lighthouse, in case of breakage.

storm-path (stôrm'pāth), n. Same as storm-track.

storm-pavement (stôrm'pāv'ment), n. In hydraulic engin., a sloping stone pavement lining the sea-face of a pier or breakwater. E. H. Knight.

storm-petrel (stôrm'pet'el), n. A small blackish petrel, belonging to the genus Procellaria as now restricted, or to one of a few closely related genera, as Oceanites, Cymodochæ, and Halocæpten. The three best-known storm-petrels are Procellaria pelagica, Cymodochæ leucorhoa, and Oceanites oceanicus. All are also called Mother Carey's chickens. See cut under petrel. The form stormy petrel is also common.

storm-proof (stôrm'prōf), a. Proof against storms or stress of weather.

storm-sail (stôrm'sāl), n. A sail made of very stout canvas, of smaller size than the corresponding sail in ordinary use, set in squally or heavy weather.

storm-signal (stôrm'sig'nāl), n. A signal displayed on sea-coasts and lake-shores for indicating the expected prevalence of high winds or storms.

For this purpose flags and lanterns are used in the United States, and a cone and drum in Great Britain. In the practice of the United States Weather Bureau, a red flag with black center is displayed by day when a violent storm is expected, and an additional pennant indicates the quadrant of the probable wind-direction, as follows: red pennant above flag, northeasterly winds; red pennant below flag, southeasterly winds; white pennant above flag, northwesterly winds; white pennant below flag, southwesterly winds. By night, a red light indicates easterly winds, and a white light above a red light indicates westerly winds. In the British system the inverted cone indicates a south gale, the upright cone a north gale, while the addition of the drum indicates that the winds are expected to be of marked violence. See weather-signal.

English storm signal, indicating dangerous winds from the south.

storm-stay (stôrm'stā), n. A stay on which a storm-sail is set.

storm-stayed (stôrm'stād), a. Prevented from proceeding on, or interrupted in the course of, a journey or voyage by storms or stress of weather.

storm-stone (stôrm'stōn), n. Same as thunder-bolt.

storm-tossed (stôrm'tost), a. Tossed about by storm or tempest: as, a storm-tossed bark; hence, agitated by conflicting passions or emotions: as, his storm-tossed spirit is at rest.

storm-track (stôrm'trak), n. The path traversed by the center of a cyclonic storm. North of the parallel of 30° storm-tracks almost invariably pursue an easterly course, having generally a northerly inclination. Within the tropics storm-tracks almost invariably tend westerly, generally with an inclination toward the pole; they have rarely, if ever, been traced nearer to the equator than 6°. Continuous storm-tracks are sometimes traced across North America, the Atlantic ocean, and Europe; but in general less than 12 per cent. of the storms leaving America reach the European coast.

storm-wind (stôrm'wind), n. The wind or blast of a storm or tempest; a hurricane; also, a wind that brings a storm.

Then comes, with an awful roar, Gathering and sounding on,
The storm-wind from Labrador,
The wind Euroclydon,
The storm-wind!
Longfellow, Midnight Mass.

storm-window (stôrm'win dō), n. 1. An outer window to protect the inner from inclemency of the weather.—2. A window raised from the roof and slated above and on each side.

stormy (stôrm'i), a. [< ME. stormi, < AS. stormig (= D. Sw. stormig = MHG. stürmie, G. stürmig), < storm, storm; see storm.] 1. Characterized by storm or tempest, or by high winds; tempestuous; boisterous: as, a stormy season.

No cloudy show of stormy blustering weather
Both yet in his fair welkin once appear.
Shak., Lucree, l. 115.

His trumpet has often been heard by the neighbors, of a stormy night, mingling with the howling of the blast.
Irvine, Knickerbocker, p. 448.

2. Characterized by violent disturbances or contentions; agitated; turbulent.

For love is yet the most stormy life,
Right of himself, that ever was begone.
Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 778.

His [Warren Hastings's] administration, so eventful and stormy, closed in almost perfect quiet.

Mercantile, Warren Hastings.

3. Violent; passionate; easily roused to anger or strife.

The lives of all your loving complices
Lean on your health; the which, if you give o'er
To stormy passion, must perforce decay.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., i. l. 165.

The stormy chiefs of a desert but extensive domain.
Scott.

4. Associated with storms, as seen in them or supposed to presage them; specifically, in ornithology, noting certain petrels.—Stormy petrel. Same as storm-petrel.—Syn. 1. Windy, gusty, squally, blustering. See ivind.

storm-zone (stôrm'zōn), n. Same as storm-belt. The regions between 40° and 70° latitude are the great storm-zones of the world.

R. Hinman, Eclectic Physical Geography, p. 94.

stornello stōr-nel'lo, n.; pl. stornelli (-li). [It.] A form of Italian folk-song, usually improvised and either sentimental or satirical.

The Tuscan and Umbrian stornello is much shorter [than the rispetto], consisting, indeed, of a hemistich naming some natural object which suggests the motive of the little poem.

Encyc. Brit., XIX, 272.

Storthing (stôr'ting), n. [Dan. Norw. størthing (= leel, størthing), great or high court, parliament. < stor (= Sw. stor = leel, storr = AS. stôr, > E. stoor), great, + thing = Sw. ting = leel, thing, assembly, meeting, = AS. thing; see thing.] The national parliament of Norway. It is composed of 114 members, who are chosen by indirect election. The Storthing is convened every year, and divides itself into an upper house (Lathing) and a lower house (Odelsthing). The former is composed of one fourth, and the latter of three fourths of the members. See Lathing and Odelsthing.

storven. Preterit plural and past participle of Middle English steren, die. See starve.

story¹ (stô'ri), n.; pl. stories (-riz). [ME. storie, storie (cf. It. storia, < LL. storia), an apbetic form of istoric, historic, history: see history.] 1. A connected account or narration, oral or written, of events of the past; history. The prime virtue of Story is verity.

Howell, Vocall Forrest, Pref. She was well versed in the Greek and Roman story, and was not unskilled in that of France and England.

Swift, Death of Stella.

There's themes enough in Caledonian story Would show the tragic muse in a her glory.

Burns, Prologue for Mr. Sutherland's Benefit.

2. An account of an event or incident; a relation; a recital: as, stories of bravery. A lured man, to lere the [teach thee] . . . of gode Friday the storye.

Piers Plowman (B), xiii, 447.

And tell sad stories of the death of kings;

How some have been deposed, some slain in war.

Shak., Rich. II., iii, 2, 156.

To make short of a long story, . . . I have been bred up from childhood with great expectations.

Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, vi.

3. In lit., a narrative, either true or fictitious, in prose or verse; a tale, written in a more or less imaginative style, of that which has happened or is supposed to have happened; specifically, a fictitious tale, shorter and less elaborate than a novel; a short romance; a folk-tale. R. Eden, tr. of Sebastian Munster (First Books on America, [ed. Arber, p. 222]).

24. A place for taking either liquid or vapor baths; a bath-house or bath-room.

In that village there was a Stove, into which the captaine went in the morning, requesting M. Garrard to go also to the same to wash himself.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 423.

There are in Fez a hundred bath-stoves well built, with four Halls in each, and certain Galleries without, in which they put off their clothes.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 617.

3. A closed or partly closed vessel or receiver in which fuel is burned, the radiated heat being utilized for warming a room or for cooking.
Stoves are made of cast-iron and sheet-iron, and also of earthenware in the form of tiles cemented together, or plaster held together by a frame of wire, or the like, and of masonry solidly put together. The stoves of tiles, masonry, etc., radiate less heat than iron stoves, but when heated remain hot for a long time. Stoves are divided into the two main classes of cooking-stoves and warming stoves, and are also classified according to the fuel used, as wood-stoves, gas-stoves, etc. There are many varieties, named according to their use, as the ear-stove, camp-stove, foot-stove, flumen's stove, etc., or according to some attachment, as a water-back stove. Warming-stoves range from the open fireplace or Franklin stove to magazine and base-burning fireplaces and heaters for warming more than one room, which are more properly furnaces. The word was first used in English in this sense as applied to foot-stoves. See foot-stove, oil stove, gas-stove.

The sempstress speeds to change with red-tipt nose;
The Belgian stove beneath her footstool glows.

Gay, Trivia, ii. 338.

4. In ceram., a pottery-kiln.—5 In a furnace, the oven in which the blast is heated.—6. The name is now given (a) to any open stove with or without doors that open widely, and with andirons or a grate similar to those of an ordinary fireplace; (b) to a kind of fireplace with back and sides of ironwork and some arrangement for heating the air in chambers which communicate with the room.—Norwegian stove. A chamber the walls of which are made as perfect non-conductors of heat as possible, used for cooking by enabling a pot or saucepan full of boiling water, placed in it, to retain its heat for a great length of time, thus stewing the meat, etc., which it may contain. The same chamber may be used as a refrigerator, as it keeps ice unmelted for a long time.—Rotary stove. See rotary oven, under oven.

straggler (strag'gl-ēr), n. [Gr. στράβωσις + -er.] 1. One who straggles or strays away, as from his fellows or from the direct or proper course; one who lags behind or becomes separated in any way from his companions, as from a body of troops on the march.

This manner of speech is termed the figure of digression by the Latines, following the Greeke original; we also call him the straggler, by allusion to the soldier that marches out of his array. Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 195.

The first stragglers of a battalion of rocks, guarding a sort of pass, beyond which the beck rushed down a waterfall. Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xxiv.

2. Specifically, in ornith., a stray, or strayed bird, out of its usual range, or off its regular migration. The stragglers are the casual or accidental visitants in any avifauna. In the nature of the case they are never numerous as regards individuals; but the list of what are technically called stragglers in any region or locality usually becomes, in the course of time, a long one, so far as species are concerned. Thus, in the avifauna of the District of Columbia, the stragglers are about as many species as the regular visitants of either summer or winter, or the permanent residents of the year round, though fewer than the spring and autumn migrants.

3. One who roams or wanders about at random, or without settled direction or object; a wanderer; a vagabond; especially, a wandering, shiftless fellow; a tramp.

Let's whip these stragglers over the seas again. Shak., Rich. III., v. 3. 327.

Bottles missing are supposed to be half stolen by stragglers and other servants. Swift, Advice to Servants (Butler).

straggly (strag'gli), a. [Gr. στράβωσις + -y.] Straggling; lone and spread out irregularly; as, a straggly scrawl; a straggly village. [Colloq.]

stragular (strag'gū-lār), a. In ornith., pertaining to the stragulum or mantle; pallial.

stragulum (strag'gū-lum), n.: pl. stragula (-lū). [L. stragulum, a cover, coverlet; see strait.] In ornith., the mantle; the pallium; the back and folded wings taken together, in any way distinguished from other parts, as by color on a gull or tern. [Rare.]

strahlite (strā'lit), n. [Gr. στράβωσις, a ray, beam, arrow (see strab), + -ite.] Same as actinohite.

straight (strā't), a. and n. [Formerly also staight, straighst, Se. straught, straucht, and, with the omission of the silent guttural, straif (prob. by confusion with the diff. word strait), narrow, strict, which was also, on the other hand, formerly spelled straight]; [ME. straight, strecht, strecht, rarely strect, straight, lit. 'stretched'; AS. strahit, pp. of straccan, stretch; see stretch. Cf. ME. strek, strik, AS. strec, strec, strec = MLG. LG. strek = OHG. streich, MHG. stroe, G. streck, extended, stretched, straight, = Dan. (obs.) strag, straight, erect, tight; from the same ult. root. Cf. the equiv. right, lit. 'stretched'.] I. a. 1. Stretched; drawn out.

Sithe thi fleisch, Iord, was furst perceyned
And, for onre sake, laid strect in stalle.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 252.

Pirrus with his strecte sword.
Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 537.

2. Without bend or deviation, like a string tightly stretched; not crooked or curved; right; in geom., lying, as a line, evenly between its points. This is Euclid's definition. The principal characteristic of a straight line is that it is completely determined, if unlimited, by any two points taken upon it, or, if limited, by its two extremities. The idea of measurement does not enter into the idea of a straight line, and it is unnecessary to introduce that idea into the definition, as is done when it is said (after Legendre) to be the shortest distance between two points.

He that knoweth what is straight doth even thereby discern what is crooked, because the absence of straightness in bodies capable thereof is crookedness. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, i. 8.

There is no moe such Cæsars; other of them may have crook'd noses, but to owe such straight arms, none. Shak., Cymbeline, iii. 1. 38.

Be pleased to let thy Holy Spirit lead me in the straight paths of sanctity, without detractions to either hand. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 86.

3. Without interruption or break; direct.

Forth-with declarid to hys peple all,
And to thys cite his peple can call.
Wherunto that had an eyn straight way
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), I. 1308.

With straight air—that is, with the pressure from the main reservoir, or the air-pump, going directly to the brake cylinder—the engineer can apply the brakes to all the wheels of his train simultaneously. Scribner's Mag., VI. 333.

4. Direct; authoritative; sure; reliable; as, a straight tip. [Slang.]—5. Upright; marked by adherence to truth and fairness; fair; honorable; as, a man straight in all his dealings. [Colloq.]—6. Proceeding or acting with directness; keeping true to the course. [Colloq.]

He shows himself to be a man of wide reading, a pretty straight thinker, and a lively and independent critic. The Nation, Dec. 6, 1888, p. 459.

7. Free from disorder or irregularity; in order; as, his accounts are not quite straight.

Finally, being belted, curled, and set straight, he descended upon the drawing-room. Thackeray, Pendennis, vii.

He told her that she needn't mind the place being not quite straight, he had only come up for a few hours—he should be busy in the studio. H. James Jr., The Century, XXXVI. 215.

8. Unqualified; unreserved; out-and-out; as, a straight Democrat (that is, one who supports the entire platform and policy of his party).—9. Unmixed; undiluted; neat. [Slang.]

Dissipating their rare and precious cash on "whisky straight" in the ever-recurring bar-rooms. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX. 76.

10. East and west; along an east and west line: used of the position of the body in Christian burial.

First Clo. Is she to be buried in Christian burial that willfully seeks her own salvation?

Sec Clo. I tell thee she is; and therefore make her grave straight; the crowner hath sat on her, and finds it Christian burial. Shak., Hamlet, v. 1. 4.

11. In poker, consisting of a sequence; forming a straight: as, a straight hand; a straight flush.—A straight face, an unsmiling face; a sober, unamused expression: as, he could with difficulty keep a straight face. [Colloq.]—Long straight, See long.—Straight accents, the long marks over the vowels, as a, e, i, o, u, y.—Straight angle. See angle. 1.—Straight arch, in arch., a form of arch spanning an aperture in which the intrados is represented by straight lines which meet in a point at the top and comprise two sides of a triangle.—Straight ends and walls, a system of working coal, somewhat similar to "board and pillar." [North Wales.]—Straight flush. See flush.—Straight intestine, bowel, or gut, the rectum. See cuts under alimentary, intestine, and peritoneum.—Straight sheer. See sheer. 1.—Straight sinus, ticket, tubule, etc. See the nouns.

II. n. 1. The condition of being straight, or free from curvature or crookedness of any kind: as, to be out of the straight. [Colloq.]—2. A straight part or direction: as, the straight of a piece of timber.—3. In poker, a sequence of cards, generally five in number, or a hand containing such a sequence.

straight¹ (strāt), adv. [ME. streight, streyght, streyghte, etc.; < straight¹, a.] 1. In a straight line; without swerving or deviating from the direct course; directly.

Streight aforn hym a fair feld gan behold.

Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 4661.

Floating straight, obedient to the stream.

Shak., C. of E., i. 1. 87.

2. At once; immediately; directly; straightway.

And went streyghte into the Hospytall, and refreshed vs with mete and drynke, and rested vs there an houre or .ij. bycause of our watche the nyght before.

Sir R. Gylgforde, Pylgrymage, p. 28.

Shew him an enemy, his pan's forgot straight.

Fletcher, Humorous Lieutenant, i. 1.

straight¹ (strāt), v. t. [< straight¹, a.] To make straight; straighten. [Rare.]

The old gypsy, in the mean time, set about arranging the dead body, composing its limbs, and straightening the arms by its side. Scott, Guy Mannering, xxvii.

straight², a. and n. An obsolete spelling of strait¹.

straightaway (strāt'ā-wā'), a. Straight forward, without turn or curve: as, a straightaway course in a yacht- or horse-race.

At the Ascot, where I was last Thursday, the course is a straightaway one. T. C. Crawford, English Life, p. 28.

straight-billed (strāt'bild), a. Having the bill straight, as a bird; rectirostral.

straight-cut (strāt'kut), a. Cut in a straight manner: applied to fine grades of cut smoking tobacco. The leaves are flattened out, packed compactly, and cut lengthwise, long fibers being thus obtained that present a beautiful silky appearance.

straight-edge (strāt'ej), n. A bar having one edge, at least, as straight as possible, to be used as a fiducial line in drawing and testing straight lines. Such instruments when of the greatest accuracy are somewhat costly. Common straight-edges for ruling ordinary lines, testing the surface of millstones, brickwork and stonework, etc., are made of wood, and range from a slip of wood one foot long to planks cut in the form of a truss and ten or more feet in length. See cut under plumb-rule.

straighten¹ (strāt'n), v. [< straight¹ + -en¹] I. trans. To make straight, in any sense; specifically, to reduce from a crooked to a straight form.

A crooked stick is not straightened unless it be bent as far on the clean contrary side.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iv. 8.

To straighten the sheer. See sheer.

II. intrans. To become straight; assume a straight form.

straighten², v. t. See straiten.

straightener (strāt'nēr), n. [< straighten¹ + -er¹] One who or that which straightens.

straightening-block (strāt'ning-blok), n. An anvil used in straightening buckled saws. E. H. Knight.

straightening-machine (strāt'ning-ma-shēn'), n. In metal-work, any machine for removing a twist, bend, buckle, or kink from rails, rods, plates, straps, tubes, or wire.

straightforth (strāt'forth'), adv. [Early mod. E. straight forth; < straight¹ + forth¹] Directly; straightway.

She smote the ground, the which streight forth did yield A fruitfull Olive tree. Spenser, Muopotmos, l. 325.

straightforward (strāt'fōr'wārd), adv. [Also straightforwards, formerly also straitforward; < straight¹ + forward¹] Directly forward; right ahead.

Look not on this side or that side, or behind you as Lot's wife did, but straightforwards on the end.

J. Bradford, Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 211.

straightforward (strāt'fōr'wārd), a. [< straight-forward, adv.] 1. Direct; leading directly forward or onward.

Midway upon the journey of our life

I found myself within a forest dark,

For the straightforward pathway had been lost.

Longfellow, tr. of Dante's Inferno, l. 3.

2. Characterized by uprightness, honesty, or frankness; honest; frank; open; without deviation or prevarication: as, a straightforward course; a straightforward person, character, or answer.

In prose he wrote as he conversed and as he preached, using the plain straightforward language of common life. Southey, Bunyan, p. 49.

straightforwardly (strāt'fōr'wārd-lī), adv. In a straightforward manner. Athenaeum, No. 3258, p. 451.

straightforwardness (strāt'fōr'wārd-nēs), n. Straightforward character or conduct; undeviating rectitude: as, a man of remarkable straightforwardness.

straight-hearted, a. See strait-hearted.

straight-horn (strāt'hōrn), n. A fossil cephalopod of the family Orthoceratidae, some of which were 12 or 15 feet long: an orthoceratite. P. P. Carpenter.

straight-joint (strāt'joint), a. Noting a floor the boards of which are so laid that the joints form a continuous line throughout the length.

straightly¹ (strāt'li), adv. [< straight¹ + -ly²] In a straight line; not crookedly; directly: as, to run straightly on. Imp. Dict.

straightly², adv. An obsolete spelling of straitly.

straightness (strāt'nes), n. The property or state of being straight.

straight-out (strāt'out), a. and n. I. a. Out-and-out; straight: as, straight-out Republicans.

II. n. In U. S. politics, one who votes a straight or strictly party ticket; a thorough partizan.

Other straight-outs, as they call themselves, . . . cannot take Grant and the Republicans.

The Nation, Aug. 22, 1872, p. 113 straight-pight (strāt'pīt), a. [< straight¹ + pight¹] Straight-fixed; erect.

Straight-pight Minerva. Shak., Cymbeline, v. 5. 164.

straight-ribbed (strāt'ribd), a. In bot., having the lateral ribs straight, as leaves of Cuscuta, palms, etc.

straightway (strāt'wā), adv. [< ME. streight-uey; < straight¹ + uey¹] Immediately; forthwith; without loss of time; without delay.

Thei hilde her streight-uey toward north wales to a Citee that longed to the kynges Tradilly-maunte.

Mertin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 558.

And straightway the damsel arose and walked.

Mark v. 42.

straightways (strāt'wāz), adv. [< straightway + adv. gen. -s] Straightway.

None of the three could win a palm of ground but the other two would straightways balance it.

Bacon, Esopire (ed. 1887).

straight-winged (strāt'wingd), a. In entom., having straight wings; orthopterous.

strai¹, n. A Scotch spelling of strake².

strai², v. t. A Scotch form of strake².

strailt, n. [*< ME. stragle, < AS. stragl, stragel, contr. stræl, a bed-cover, carpet, rug, = OF. stragule, a mantle, coverlet, < L. stragulum, a spread, covering, coverlet, blanket, carpet, rug, respectively of stragulus, serving for spreading or covering, < sternere, pp. stratus, spread, strew: see stratum.] A covering; a coverlet. Prompt. Parr., p. 478.

strain¹ (strān), v. [Early mod. E. also strayne; < ME. straynen, strēučen, streynen, strayngen, < OF. streindre, estraindre, straindre, F. étreindre = Pr. estreiner, estraigner = It. stringere, stringere, < L. stringere, pp. strictus, draw tight; akin to Gr. σπῆραι, twisted, σπῆραι, press out, Lith. stregti, become stiff, freeze, AS. streccan, stretch, etc.: see stretch, straight¹. From L. stringere are also ult. E. constrain, dis-train, restrain, stringent, strait¹, strict, etc.] I. trans. 1†. To draw out; stretch; extend, especially with effort or care.

And if thi vynes footes IV ascende,

Thenne arries IV is goode forth forto streyne.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 70.

All their actions, voyces, and gestures, both in charging and retiring, were so strained to the height of their quality and nature that the strangeness thereof made it seeme very delightful. Capt. John Smith, Works, l. 136.

2†. To draw tight; tighten; make taut.

To the pyller, lorde, also,
With a rope men bownd the too,
Hard drawe and streynyd faste.

Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 181.

Sir Mungo, who watched his victim with the delighted yet wary eye of an experienced angler, became now aware that, if he strained the line on him too tightly, there was every risk of his breaking hold.

Scott, Fortunes of Nigel, xv.

3†. To confine; restrain; imprison.

There the steede in stodee strayed in bondes.

Alisaunder of Macedoine (E. E. T. S.), l. 1157.

4. To stretch to the utmost tension; put to the stretch; exert: as, to strain every nerve to accomplish something.

He sweats,
Strains his young nerves, and puts himself in posture
That acts my words. Shak., Cymbeline, iii. 3. 94.

5. To stretch beyond measure; push beyond the proper extent or limit; carry too far.

He strained the Constitution, but he conquered the Lords. N. A. Rev., CXLII. 593.

6. To impair, weaken, or injure by stretching or overtasking; harm by subjection to too great stress or exertion; hence, to sprain.

Hold, sir, hold, pray use this whistle for me,
I dare not straine my selfe to winde it I,
The Doctors tell me it will spend my spirits.

Brome, Sparagus Garden, iv. 7.

Prudes decay'd about may tack,

Strain their necks with looking back. Swift.

7. To force; constrain.

Whether that Goddes worthy forwetyng
Streyne me needely for to don a thing.

Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 422.

The quality of mercy is not strain'd.

Shak., M. of V., iv. 1. 184.

His mirth

Is forc'd and strain'd.

Sir J. Denham, The Sophy. (Latham.)

8. To urge; press.

Note if your lady strain his entertainment
With any strong or vehement importunity.

Shak., Othello, iii. 3. 250.

9. To press; squeeze; hence, to hug; embrace.

He that nyght in armes wold hire streyne Harder than ever Paris did Eleyne.

Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 509.

I would have strain'd him with a strict embrace,

Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., x. 407.

10. To press through a filter or colander; separate extraneous or coarser matters from (a liquid) by causing it to pass through a filter or colander; purify from extraneous matter by filtration; filter: as, to strain milk.—11. To separate or remove by the use of a filter or colander: with out. See phrase under r. i., below.

Ye blind guides, which strain out the gnat, and swallow the camel.

Mat. xxiii. 24 [R. V.].

12†. To force out by straining.

I at each sad strain will strain a tear.

Shak., Lucrece, l. 1131.

13. To deform, as a solid body or structure.—To strain a point. See point.—To strain courtesy, to use ceremony; stand too much upon form or ceremony; insist on the precedence of others; hang back through excess of courtesy or civility.

My business was great; and in such a case as mine a man may strain courtesy.

Shak., R. and J., ii. 4. 55.

Strain not courtesies with a noble enemy.

Lamb, Two Races of Men.

= Syn. 10. Bolt, Screen, etc. See sift.

II. intrans. 1. To exert one's self; make violent efforts; strive.

To build his fortune I will strain a little.

Shak., T. of A., i. 1. 143.

What

Has made thy life so vile that thou shouldst strain

To forfeit it to me? J. Beaumont, Psyche, ii. 105.

2. To urge; press.

Nay, Sir, indeed the fault is yours most extreamlie now.

Tray, sir, forbear to strain beyond a womans patience.

Brome, Northern Lass, iii. 3.

3. To stretch strugglingly; stretch with effort.

This parlor looked out on the dark courtyard, in which there grew two or three poplars, straining upward to the light.

Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, iii.

No sound, no sight as far as eye could strain.

Browning, Childe Roland.

4. To undergo distortions under force, as a ship in a high sea.

A ship is said to strain if in launching, or when working in a heavy sea, the different parts of it experience relative motions. Sir W. Thomson, in Phil. Trans., CXLVI. 481.

The ship ran

Straining, heeled o'er, through seas all changed and wan.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, III. 10.

5. To drip; ooze; filter; drain; flow; issue: as, water straining through sand becomes pure.

Then, in the Deserts dry and barren sand,
From flinty Rocks doth plentiful Rivers strain.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Triumph of Faith, iii. 18.
To strain at, to strive after; endeavor to reach or obtain.

I do not strain at the position.

Shak., T. and C., iii. 3. 112.

To strain at a gnat, a typographical error found in the authorized version (Mat. xxiii. 24) for strain out a gnat, the phrase found in Tyndale's and Coverdale's and other versions. See def. 11, above, and quotation there.

strain¹ (strān), n. [< strain¹, v. In some uses (def. 7), cf. strain².] 1*t.* Stretch; extent; pitch.

If it did infect my blood with joy,

Or swell my thoughts to any strain of pride,

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 5. 171.

May our Minerva

Answer your hopes, unto their largest strain!

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, Ind.

2. Stretching or deforming force or pressure; violence. [This use of the word, while permissible in literature, is incorrect in mechanics. The strain is not the force, but the deformation produced by the force.]

A difference of taste in jokes is a great strain on the affections.

George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, xv.

3. Tense or constrained state or condition; tension; great effort.

A dismal wedding! every ear at strain

Some sign of things that were to be gain.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 314.

Whether any poet . . . has exerted a greater variety of powers with less strain and less ostentation.

Landor.

4. In mech., a definite change in the shape or size of a solid body setting up an elastic resistance, or stress, or exceeding the limit of elasticity. The deformation of a fluid is not commonly called a strain. The word, which had previously been ill-defined, was made a scientific and precise term in this sense by Rankine in 1854. Thomson and Tait, in their "Treatise on Natural Philosophy," extend the term to deformations of liquid masses, and even of groups of points; and Tait subsequently extends it to any geometrical figure, so that it becomes a synonym of deformation.

Fresnel made the very striking discovery that glass and other simply refracting bodies are rendered doubly refracting when in a state of strain. To this Brewster added the observation that the requisite strain might be produced by unequal heating instead of by mechanical stress.

Tait, Light, § 292.

In this paper the word strain will be used to denote the change of volume and figure constituting the deviation of a molecule of a solid from that condition which it preserves when free from the action of external forces.

Rankine, Axes of Elasticity (1855).

A strain is any definite alteration of form or dimensions experienced by a solid. . . . If a stone, a beam, or a mass of metal in a building, or in a piece of framework, becomes condensed or dilated in any direction, or bent, or twisted, or distorted in any way, it is said to experience a strain.

W. Thomson, Mathematical Theory of Elasticity (1856).

5. A stretching of the muscles or tendons, giving rise to subsequent pain and stiffness; sprain; wrench; twist.—6. A permanent deformation or injury of a solid structure.—7. Stretch; flight or burst, as of imagination, eloquence, or song. Specifically—(a) A poem; a song; a lay.

All unworthy of thy nobler strain.

Scott, L. of the L., i. Int.

(b) Tune; melody.

I was all ear,

And took in strains that might create a soul

Under the ribs of death.

Milton, Comus, I. 561.

In sweet Italian strains our Shepherds sing.

Congreve, Opening of the Queen's Theatre, Epil.

(c) In a stricter sense, in music, a section of a piece which is more or less complete in itself. In written music the strains are often marked by double bars.

An Cynthia had but seen me dance a strain, or do but one trick, I had been kept in court.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, iv. 1.

(d) Tune; key; style or manner of speech or conduct.

The third [sort] is of such as take too high a strain at the first.

Bacon, Youth and Age (ed. 1857).

That sermon is in a strain which I believe has not been heard in this kingdom.

Burke, Rev. in France.

(e) Mood; disposition.

Henry . . . said, "I am come, young ladies, in a very moralizing strain, to observe that our pleasures in this world are always to be paid for."

Jane Austen, Northanger Abbey, xxvi.

Axes of a homogeneous strain, three straight lines of particles perpendicular to one another both before and after the strain.—Composition of strains. See composition of displacements, under composition.—Concurrent stress and strain. See concurrent.—Homogeneous or uniform strain, a strain which leaves every straight line of particles straight, and every pair of parallel lines parallel.—Longitudinal strain. See longitudinal.—Normal plane of a homogeneous strain, one of three planes each containing two of the three axes. There is generally only one such system of planes through each point of the body.—Orthogonal strain. (a) Relatively to a stress, a strain which neither does nor uses work by virtue of that stress. (b) Relatively to another strain, a strain orthogonal to a stress perfectly concurrent to the other strain.—

Principal strain. Same as principal strain-type (which see, under strain-type).—Pure strain, a homogeneous strain which does not rotate any axis of the strain.—Simple strain, any one of a number of strains conceived as independent components of other strains which they are employed to define. The phrase simple strain has no definite meaning, but simple longitudinal strain, simple tangential strain, simple shearing strain, etc., mean such strains existing not as components merely, but as resultants. Thus, if a bar is elongated without any transverse contraction or expansion, there is a simple longitudinal strain in the direction of the elongation. A simple tangential strain is a homogeneous strain in which all the particles are displaced parallel to one plane.—Strain-ellipsoid. See ellipsoid.—To heave a strain. See heave.—Type of a strain. See type.

strain² (strān), n. [An altered form, due appar. to confusion with strain¹, 7, of what would be reg. streen; < ME. streen, streeu, streu, earlier stroom, istroom, race, stock, generation, < AS. gestrum, gestrum, gain, wealth (= OS. gistrum, = OHG. gistrum, gain, property, wealth, business); appar. confused in ME. with the related noun, ME. strend, strund, strand, < AS. strjūd, race, stock; < streman, strigun = OHG. strinan, beget, gestrūm, get, acquire.] 1. Race; stock; generation; descent; hence, family blood; quality or line as regards breeding; breed; a race or breed; a variety, especially an artificial variety, of a domestic animal. Strain indicates the least recognizable variation from a given stock, or the ultimate modification to which an animal has been subjected. But since such variation usually proceeds by insensible degrees, the significance of strain grades into that of breed, race, or variety.

Bountee comth al of God, nat of the streen
Of which they been engendered and ybore.

Chaucer, Clerk's Tale, l. 101.

O, if thou wert the noblest of thy strain,

Young man, thou couldst not die more honourable.

Shak., J. C., v. 1. 59.

The ears of a cat vary in shape, and certain strains, in England, inherit a pencil-like tuft of hairs, above a quarter of an inch in length, on the tips of their ears.

Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants, i.

2. Hereditary or natural disposition; turn; tendency; character.

Sir, you have shown to-day your valiant strain.

Shak., Lear, v. 3. 40.

And here I shall not restrain righteousness to the particular virtue of justice, but enlarge it according to the genius and strain of the book of the Proverbs.

Tillotson.

3. Sort; kind; style.

Let man learn a prudence of a higher strain.

Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 214.

4. Trace; streak.

With all his merit there was a strain of weakness in his character.

Bancroft, Hist. Const., II. 6.

5. The shoot of a tree. Hallivell (under streu). [Prov. Eng.]—6*t.* The track of a deer.

When they have shot a Deere by land, they follow him like blood-hounds by the blood, and streu, and oftentimes so take them.

Capt. John Smith, Works, I. 134.

strain³ (strān), v. t. [An aphetic form of distrain.] To restrain.

When my lord refused to pay the two shillings, Mr. Knightly charged the constable to strain two shillings' worth of goods.

Court and Times of Charles I., l. 56.

strainable (strā'na-bl), a. [Early mod. E. strenable, strenable; < strain¹ + -able.] 1*t.* Constraining; compelling; violent.

This yere the Duke of Burgon, . . . with his xii. M. men, was dryuen in to England, with a fere strenable wynde, in ther selynge towarde Spayn.

Arnold's Chron. (1502), p. xliii.

2. Capable of being strained.

strainably (strā'na-bli), adv. [Early mod. E. strenably; < strainable + -ly.] Violently; fiercely.

The wind . . . droue the flame so strenably amongst the tents and cabins of the Saxons, that the fire . . . increased the feare amongst the soldidours worfullie.

Hollinshed, Hist. Scotland, p. 95.

strained¹ (strānd), p. a. [< strain¹ + -ed.] Forced; carried beyond proper limits; as, a strained interpretation of a law.

strained² (strānd), a. [< strain² + -ed.] Of this or that strain or breed, as an animal.

strainer (strā'nēr), n. [< ME. streynour, strenyore; < strain¹ + -er.] 1. One who or that which strains.—2. A stretcher or tightener; as, a strainer for wire fences.—3. Any utensil for separating small solid particles from the liquid that contains them, either to preserve the solid objects or to clarify the liquid, or for both purposes.

Item, j. dressing knyfe, j. fyre schowle, ij. treys, j. streynour.

Paston Letters, I. 496.

4. In carriage-building: (a) A reinforcing strip or button at the back of a panel. (b) Canvas glued to the back of a panel to prevent warping or cracking. Also called stretcher. Strainer of Hippocrates. Same as Hippocrates's sieve (which see, under sieve).

2. pl. An infectious catarrh of the upper air-passages, especially the nasal cavity, of the horse, ass, and mule, associated with suppuration of the submaxillary and other lymphatic glands. The disease usually attacks young animals. Enfeebled health, exposure, and neglect are predisposing causes. It may appear as an epizootic in large stables. The mortality is from 2 to 3 per cent. The disease begins with fever and a serous discharge from the nose, which later becomes viscid. At the same time a swelling appears under the jaws, indicating inflammation and suppuration of the submaxillary glands. The disease ordinarily lasts several weeks. Complications may, however, appear. The throat and neighboring lymphatics may become involved and the infection extend to various parts of the system, giving rise to pyemia. Specific bacteria (Streptococci) have been found in the suppurating glands.

(Hope, 1837).] In culam, a genus of large American scarabid beetles, whose males usually have three prothoracic horns. They are mainly tropical and subtropical, but S. anticus extends north to Massachusetts.—3. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of mollusks.

strategy (strat'ē-jī), n. [< OF. strategie, F. strategie = Sp. estrategia = It. strategia, strategy (cf. L. strategia, a government, province), < Gr. στρατηγία, the office or dignity of a commander, generalship, a pretorship, government, province, < στρατηγός, the leader or commander of an army, a general, a governor, pretor, consul, < στρατός, an army, host, soldiery (prop. an encamped army, lit. 'scattered, spread' (= L. stratus, scattered, spread), < σπείρειν = L. sternere (pp. stratus), scatter, spread, strew; see stratum], + ἀγέρω, lead (see agent).] 1. The science of combining and employing the means which the different branches of the art of war afford, for the purpose of forming projects of operations and of directing great military movements; the art of moving troops so as to be enabled either to dispense with a battle or to deliver one with the greatest advantage and with the most decisive results; generalship. In strategy three things demand especial consideration: (1) the base of operations, or line from which an army commences its advance upon an enemy; (2) the objective, or objective point, the point which it aims to possess, or the object which it strives to attain; (3) the line of operations, or that line which an army must pass over to attain its objective point. When an army assumes a strictly defensive attitude, the base of operations becomes the line of defense, and in a retrograde movement the line of operations becomes the line of retreat. Strategical points are the points of operations of an army—namely, points whose occupation secures an undoubted advantage to the army holding them for offensive and defensive purposes, and points which it is the chief object of an army to attain. The theater of operations comprises the territory to be invaded or defended by an army. It includes the base of operations, the objective point, the front of operations, the lines of operation, the lines of communication which connect the several lines of operations, obstacles, natural or artificial, lines of retreat, and places of refuge. The front of operations is the length of the line in advance of the base of operations covered or occupied by an army.

2. The use of artifice, finesse, or stratagem for the carrying out of any project.

strath (strath), n. [< Gael. srath = Ir. srath, sratha = W. ystard, a valley; perhaps connected with street, ult. < L. strata: see street.] In Scotland, a valley of considerable size, often having a river running through it and giving it its distinctive appellation: as, Strathspey (the valley of the Spey), Strathern (the valley of the Earn), and Strathmore (the great valley).

strathspey (strath-spā'), n. [So called from Strathspey in Scotland.] 1. A Scotch dance, invented early in the eighteenth century, resembling the reel, but slower, and marked by numerous sudden jerks.

While youths and maids the light strathspey

So nimbly danced, with Highland glee!

Scott, Glenfinlas.

2. Music for such a dance or in its rhythm, which is duple, moderately rapid, and abounding in the rhythmic or metric figure called the Scotch snap or catch (which see, under Scotch), or its converse.

stratulate (strā-tik'ū-lāt), a. [< NL. stratulus*, < straticulum*, dim. of stratum, a layer: see stratum.] Arranged in thin layers, as a banded agate.

stratification (strat-i-fī-kā'shon), n. [= F. stratification = Sp. estratificación = It. stratificazione; as stratify + -ation.] 1. The act of stratifying, or the state of being stratified; formation or arrangement in layers.

It was formerly the practice in England, as it still is on the Continent, to tan by the process of stratification, for which purpose a bed of bark is made upon the bottom of the pit; upon this is laid the hide, then bark, then a hide, and so on until the pit is full.

Encyc. Brit., XIV. 355.

2. Specifically, in geol., deposition in beds or strata; the mode of occurrence of those rocks which have been laid down or spread over the surface by water. The most important indication and result of stratification is that the rock separates more or less easily along the planes separating the beds or strata. Each stratification-plane marks a change in the character of the deposit, or a shorter or longer period during which deposition was suspended. Often one stratum is succeeded by another of quite different character, showing a change in the existing conditions. Sometimes, however, a rock is distinctly stratified, but each stratum separates easily into much thinner layers, closely resembling one another in petrographic character; this is generally called lamination.

In some cases the apparent stratification seems to be of the nature of an imperfect cleavage, there having been a certain amount of rearrangement of the particles of the rock parallel to the planes of deposition. See cuts under Arterian and crosin.

3. In physiol., the thickening of a cell-wall by the deposition of successive thin layers of formed material; also, the arrangement of the layers so deposited.

It is now known that stratification is due to a subsequent change in the amount of wall of organization present in particular parts of the cell wall. Bosch, Botany, p. 35.

4. In delect., the appearance presented by an electric discharge, or a series of rapid discharges, in a rarefied gas, light and dark bands or striae being produced.

stratified (strat'i-fid), p. a. Arranged or deposited in layers or strata: as, stratified rocks. See cut under crasium.—Stratified cartilage, ordinary white fibrocartilage.—Stratified epithelium. See epithelium.—Stratified thallus, in lichens, a thallus in which the gonidia, or algal cells, are disposed in one or more layers, thus producing stratification. See helminthothrix, (c) (2).

stratiform (strat'i-fōrm), a. [< NL. stratum, a layer, + forma, form.] Forming or formed into a layer or lamella; embedded as a stratum or layer: stratified; specifically used in the anatomy of a form of cartilage.—Stratiform cartilage or fibrocartilage, a layer of cartilage embedded in a groove of bone along which the tendon of a muscle plays; referring not to a special kind of cartilage, but to the particular form in which it is arranged. The cartilage lining the bicipital groove of the humerus, on which the tendon of the long head of the biceps glides, is an example.

stratify (strat'i-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. stratified, ppr. stratifying. [= F. stratifier = It. stratificare, < NL. stratum, a layer, + L. facere, make, do.] To form into a layer or layers, as substances in the earth; lay or arrange in strata.

stratigrapher (strā-tig'ra-fēr), n. [< stratigraphy + -er.] One who devotes himself to the study of stratigraphical geology. Nature, XLIII. 142.

stratigraphic (strat-i-graf'ik), a. [< stratigraphy + -ic.] Having to do with the order of succession, mode of occurrence, and general geological character of the series of stratified rocks of which the earth's crust is largely composed.

stratigraphical (strat-i-graf'ik-al), a. [< stratigrapher + -al.] Same as stratigraphic.

stratigraphically (strat-i-graf'ik-al-i), adv. In a stratigraphic manner; as regards stratigraphy, or the disposition of strata.

stratigraphist (strā-tig'ra-fist), n. [< stratigraphy + -ist.] One who studies stratigraphy; a stratigrapher. Nature, XXXVIII. 506.

stratigraphy (strā-tig'ra-fī), n. [< NL. stratum, a layer, + Gr. -γραφία, < γράφω, write.] In geol., order and position of the stratified groups; all that part of geological science which is not specially theoretical or paleontological; general descriptive geology.

Stratiomyia (strat-i-ō-mī'i-ā), n. [NL. (Macquart, 1838), orig. Stratiomyia (Geoffroy, 1764), also Stratiomya (Schiner, 1868), Stratonyia (Schelling, 1803), Stratonyia (J. E. Gray, 1832); irreg. < Gr. στρατιώτης, a soldier, + μύια, a fly.] The typical genus of the family Stratiomyidae. They are medium-sized or rather large flies of dark color with light spots or stripes. The larvae live in mud or damp sand, and the flies are found upon umbelliferous and other flowers growing near water. About 40 species are known in North America, and about 20 in Europe. They are sometimes called chameleon-flies, from the name of one species, S. chameleon.

Stratiomyidæ (strat-i-ō-mī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Leach, 1819, as Stratiomyidæ), < Stratiomyia + -idæ.] A family of true flies, belonging to the brachycerous Diptera and to the section Notacanthæ. It is a large and wide spread family; about 200 species occur in North America. They vary much in size and color, and have a large hemispherical head, flattened or convex abdomen, and tibiae usually without spurs. They are mostly flower flies, and are often found upon vegetation in damp places.

Stratiotæ (strat-i-ō-tē-ā), n. pl. [NL. (Link, 1829), < Stratiotes + -æ.] A tribe of monocotyledonous plants, of the order Hydrocharitæ and series Gluphææ. It is characterized by a very short stem bearing crowded sessile submerged leaves and usually also long-petioled floating leaves, by peduncled spathes, and by one-celled ovaries spuriously six-celled by intrusion of the lobed placenta. It includes few genera of which Stratiotes is the type. (See also Hydrocharis.) The others are mostly tropical plants of fresh water, with ovate-oblong or broadly cordate floating leaves and ribbed or winged spathes.

Stratiotes (strat-i-ō-tē-ā), n. [NL. (in def. 1 (Linnaeus, 1757) so called from the sword-like leaves), < Gr. στρατιώτης, sc. στρατιώτης, an Egyptian water-plant, by some said to have been the water-lettuce, Pistia Stratiotes; lit. 'river-soldicē (στρατιώτης, a soldier, < στρατός, an army, < στρατός, an army; see strategy. Cf. stratist, stratist). 1. A genus of water-plants, of the order Hydrocharitaceae, type of the tribe Stratiotaceae. It is without floating leaves, unlike the rest of its tribe, and is characterized by spathe of two leaves which in the male inflorescence the base of a long pedicel bearing two or more flowers with from 11 to 15 stamens each. The female flowers are solitary and short-pedicelled, with numerous linear stamens, 6 slender two-cleft styles, and a beaked ovary becoming in fruit ovoid and acuminate, externally fleshy, and exserted from its spathe on a recurved pedicel. The only species, S. alvodes, the water-soldier, is a native of Europe and Siberia, and resembles a small alga. It is a perennial submerged aquatic, with somewhat fleshy crowded sword-shaped leaves, which are acute, sessile, and sharply serrate. The flowers are borne above the surface of the water; each perianth consists of three calyx-like segments and three much larger wavy crisped white petals. Old names are knightswort, crab's-claw, and water-sengreen.

2. In entom., a genus of South American earabid beetles. Putzeys, 1846.

strato-cirrus (strā-tō-sir'ns), n. [NL., < stratus + cirrus.] A cloud very like cirro-stratus, but more compact in structure, and formed at a lower altitude. Abercromby.

stratocracy (strā-tōk'ra-si), n. [Gr. στρατός, an army, + κράτος, < κρατιν, rule.] A military government; government by force of arms.

Enough exists to show that the form of polity [according to Plato's system] would be a martial aristocracy, a qualified stratocracy. De Quincy, Plato.

strato-cumulus (strā-tō-kū'mū-lus), n. [NL., < stratus + cumulus.] A stratum of low cloud consisting of separate irregular masses; a cloud of the layer type, but not sufficiently uniform to be pure stratus. Also called cumulo-stratus.

stratographic (strat-ō-graf'ik), a. [Gr. stratographia + -ic.] Pertaining to stratigraphy.

stratographical (strat-ō-graf'ik-al), a. [Gr. stratographia + -al.] Same as stratographic.

stratographically (strat-ō-graf'ik-al-i), adv. In a stratographic manner.

stratography (strā-tog'ra-fi), n. [Gr. στρατός, an army, + γραφία, < γράφω, write.] Description of armies or what belongs to an army.

A great commander by land and by sea, he [Raleigh] was critical in all the arts of stratography, and delights to illustrate them on every occasion.

I. D. Israeli, Amen. of Lit., II, 273.

Stratonic (strā-ton'ik), a. Same as Stratonical.

Stratonical (strā-ton'ik-al), a. [Gr. Strato (see def.) + -ical.] Pertaining to Strato or Straton of Lampasus, called "the physicist," the third head of the Peripatetic school of philosophy, over which he presided from 288 to 270 B. C. He was a thorough materialist, and held that every particle of matter has a plastic and seminal power, and that the world is formed by natural development.—Stratonical atheism, a form of evolutionism which replaces the absolute chance of the Epicureans by a sort of life which is regarded as an intrinsic attribute of matter.

There is, indeed, another form of atheism, . . . we for distinction sake shall call Stratonical, such as, being too modest and shamefaced to fetch all things from the fortuitous motion of atoms, would therefore allow to the several parts of matter a certain kind of natural (though not animal) perception, such as is devoid of reflexive consciousness, together with a plastic power whereby they may be able artificially and methodically to form and frame themselves to the best advantage of their respective capabilities—something like to Aristotle's Nature, but that it hath no dependence at all upon any higher mind or deity. Cudworth, Intellectual System, ii, § 3.

stratopelite (strā-tō'pē-it), n. [Gr. NL. stratum, a layer; second element uncertain.] A hydrous silicate of manganese, of uncertain composition, derived from the alteration of rhodonite.

stratose (strā'tōs), a. [Gr. NL. stratosus, < stratum, a layer; see stratum.] In bot., stratified; arranged in more or less clearly defined layers. Furrow, Marine Algae, p. 51.

stratotic (strā-tot'ik), a. [Irreg. < Gr. στρατός, an army, + -tic; or erroneously for stratotic, < Gr. στρατιωτικός, of or pertaining to a soldier, < στρατιώτης, a soldier; see Stratiotes.] Warlike; military. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

stratum (strā'tum), n.; pl. strata (-tā). [NL., < L. stratum, a spread for a bed, a coverlet, quilt, blanket, a pillow, bolster, a bed, also pavement, prop. neut. of stratus (= Gr. στρατός, an army), pp. of sternere, = Gr. σκαπνύω, spread, extend. Cf. strew.] A layer of material, formed either naturally or artificially. Specifically—(a) In geol., same as bed. See bed, G (c), and stratification, also cut under Artisan. (b) In zool. and anat., a layer of tissue, as a membrane, etc.; a lamina or lamella; especially, one of several similar or superposed layers specified by a qualifying word; used with either English or Latin context.—Gonidial stratum. See gonidial.—Rise of strata, in geol.. See dip, a, 4 (a).—Secondary strata, in geol., the Mesozoic strata.—Stratum bacillosum. Same as rod-and-cone layer of the retina (which see, under retina).—Stratum cinereum, a layer of gray matter in the nates, lying just beneath the stratum zonale, with few and small ganglion-cells.—Stratum corneum, the outer layer of the epidermis, above the stratum granulosum. See cut under skin.—Stratum cylindrorum. Same as stratum bacillosum.—Stratum gelatinosum, a layer of gray matter of the olfactory bulb, consisting of fusiform or pyramidal gray nerve-cells in a fine mesh of white nerve-fiber. Stratum glomerulosum, a layer of gray matter of the olfactory bulb, consisting of nodulated masses containing small nuclear cells, among which is a convoluted olfactory nerve-fiber.—Stratum granulosum, the thin stratum next above the stratum spinosum of the epidermis, consisting of cells rendered granular by minute globules of ceratohyalin. It is wanting over the lips and under the nails, and gives the white color to the skin. See cut under skin.—Stratum lacunosum, a layer of the hippocampus major, next above the stratum radiatum, characterized by the open reticulated nature of the neuropil.—Stratum lucidum, the lowest layer of the stratum corneum of the epidermis. See cut under skin.—Stratum opticum, the layer in the upper quadrangular body which lies below the stratum cinereum, composed of longitudinal white fibers interspersed with ganglion-cells.—Stratum radiatum, a layer of the hippocampus major, striated at right angles to its surface by the processes of the large pyramidal cells which lie along its inner border.—Stratum spinosum, the lowest layer of the epidermis, next to the corium, formed of prickles, and limited above by the stratum granulosum. Also called rete mucosum, rete Malpighii or Malpighi, and stratum Malpighii or Malpighi. See cut under skin.—Stratum zonale, a superficial stratum of white nerve-fibers.

stratus (strā'tus), n. [NL., < L. stratus, a spread for a bed, a coverlet, < sternere, pp. stratus, spread, extend; see stratum.] A continuous horizontal sheet of cloud, generally of uniform thickness. It is essentially a fine weather cloud, and is characteristic of areas of high pressure. In the evening and morning of fine days it frequently appears as a low foggy canopy overspreading the whole or a part of the sky, and disappears as the heat of the day increases. All low detached clouds which look like lifted fog and are not consolidated into definite forms are stratus. It is the lowest of the clouds. Abbreviated s. See cut under cloud.

All cloud which lies as a thin flat sheet must either be pure stratus or contain the word strato in combination.

Abercromby, Weather, p. 71.

straucht, straight (strācht), a. and v. Obsolete or dialectal (Scotch) forms of straight.

straight (strāt), a. [By aphoresis from dis-traight. Cf. tract.] Distracted.

So as being now straight of minde, desperate, and a verie fool, he goeth, etc.

R. Scot, Witchcraft, L & b. (Nares.)

straighter, straight (strāht), a. Obsolete forms of the preterit and past participle of stretch.

stravagant, a. [= It. stravagante; an aphetic form of extravagant.] Extravagant; profuse.

stravaig (strā-vāg'), v. i. [Also stravaig; prop. stravaig*, < OE. extravagare = Olt. stravagare, < ML. extravagari, wander out or beyond; see extravagant. Cf. stravagant.] To stroll; wander; go about idly. [Scotch and Irish.]

What did ye come here for? To go prancing down to the shore and back from the shore, and stravagging about the place? W. Black, in Fair Lochaber, vii.

stravaiger (strā-vāg'ēr), n. [Gr. stravagare + -er.] One who wanders about idly; a stroller; a wanderer. [Scotch and Irish.]

straw (strā), n. and a. [= Sc. strac; < ME. straw, stran, stra, strec, strec, < AS. streda*, streda*, strede* (found independently only in the form streda (appar. pl.), in two glosses, otherwise only in comp. streberie, etc.; see strawberry) = OS. strō = OFries. strō = MD. straw, stroy, D. stroo = MLG. strō, LG. stro = OHG. strō, MHG. strou, strō (straw-, strou-, strow-), G. stroh = Icel. strā = Sw. strā = Dan. straa, straw; appar. 'that which is scattered about' (if so, it must have been orig. applied to the broken stalks of grain after threshing, the simple sense 'stalk' being then later), from the root of strew (dial. strac): see strew, *straw*2; cf. L. stramen, straw, < sternere, pp. stratus, strew (see *straw*3, stramaye, strammul, stratum).] 1. n. 1. The stalk or stem of certain species of grain, pulse, etc., chiefly of wheat, rye, oats, barley, buckwheat, and pease, cut or broken off (and usually dry); also, a piece of such a stem.

When shepherds pipe on oaten straws.

Shaks, L. L. L., v. 2, 913.

2. Such stalks collectively, especially after drying and threshing; as, a load of straw. In this sense a collective without plural.

Ne how the fyr was couched first with strow, And thanne with drye stokes cloven a three.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 2075.

3. Figuratively, anything proverbially worthless: the least possible thing.

For thy sword and thy bow I care not a straw.

Nor all thine arrows to boot.

Robin Hood and the Tanner (Child's Ballads, V, 225).

Love, like despair, catches at straws.

Scott, Quentin Durward, xxv.

4. [In allusion to the proverb, "A straw shows which way the wind blows."] A slight fact, taken as an instance in proof of a tendency.—5. A clay pipe, especially a long one. [Colloq.]—6. Same as straw-needle.—7. In entom., a stick-insect; a walking-stick.—Dunstable straw, wheat-straw used for bonnet-plaits. The middle part of the straw above the last joint is selected. It is cut into lengths of about 10 inches, which are then split by a machine into slips of the requisite width. Whole Dunstable signifies a plait that is formed of seven entire straws, while a patent Dunstable consists of fourteen split straws. Simmonds.—Face of straw, a sham; a mere effigy.

out drops the Vizor, and a Face of straw appears. Roger North, Examen, III, viii, § 6.

In the straw, lying-in, as a mother; in childbirth.

Our English plain Proverb de Puerperis, "they are in the straw," shows Feather-Beds to be of no ancient use among the common sort of our nation.

Fallor, Worthies, Lincolnshire, II, 263. (Davies.)

Jack of straw. Same as jackstraw, 1.—Leghorn straw. See Leghorn.—Man of straw. See man.—Pad in the straw. See pad.—To break a straw, to quarrel. Cull. tr. of Apophthegms of Erasmus, p. 68.—To draw straws, to give indications of sleepiness.

Lady Anise. I'm sure 'tis time for honest folks to be a-bed.

Miss. Indeed my eyes draw straws.

Scott, Polite Conversation, iii.

To lay a straw, to pause and make a note. Holland, tr. of Camden, p. 141.

II. a. 1. Made or composed of straw: as, a straw hat.—2. Sham; fictitious; useless: as, a straw bid. Compare straw bail, under *bail*2, 5.—Straw bond. See *bond*1.—Straw bonnet, a bonnet made of woven or plaited straw. See straw hat, Dunstable straw (above), and Leghorn.—Straw hat, a hat made of straw either woven together in one piece or, as is more common, plaited into a narrow braid which is wound spirally, the separate turns being sewed together where the edges touch. Hats for men and bonnets for women are included under the general term.—Straw mosaic, rope, etc. See the nouns.—Straw vote, a vote taken without previous notice, in a casual gathering or otherwise. See L, 4.

straw1 (strā), v. t. [Gr. *straw*1, n.] To furnish or bind with straw; apply straw to.—Strawed seal, a seal containing a straw, a blade of grass, or a rush, or several of these, embedded in the wax, often around it as a border, or tied in fastening the seal to the document. Such additions to the ordinary seal were often made in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; but whether the purpose was to strengthen or protect the wax or to preserve a fragment of the clod delivered in making livery of seizin seems to be matter of conjecture.

straw2 (strā), v. t. An obsolete or dialectal form of strew. Ex. xxxii, 20.

She strawed the roses on the ground,

Threw her mantle on the brier.

Lord John (Child's Ballads, I, 135).

strawberry (strā'ber'i), n.; pl. strawberries (-iz). [Gr. ME. strawbery, strawberi, strabery, straberi, strebry, strebri, strebere, also (in comp.) strawbery, strobry, < AS. strāberie, strāberige, also contracted strāberie, strāberige, strāberge, also strāwberge, strāberie, late AS. strāberie (in comp.), strawberry (also called corthberie, G. erdberre, 'earth-ber'), < streda*, straw, + berie, berry; see *straw*1 and *berry*1. The first element, lit. 'straw,' is very rare in AS. use, and its exact application here is uncertain. It may be taken in the sense of 'a long stem,' referring to the runners of the plant, or it may allude to an old habit of stringing the berries on a straw. The word is often erroneously explained as a corruption of a supposed strayberry*, or even as referring to the common use of straw or hay about the plants to keep the earth from soiling the berries. No corresponding name appears in the other languages. Cf. strawberry-wine.] The fruit of any of the species of the genus Fragaria, or the plant itself. The plants are stemless, propagating by slender runners (whence they are often called strawberry-vines), with trifoliate leaves, and scapes a few inches high, bearing mostly white-petaled flowers in small cymes, followed by the "berry," which consists of an enlarged fleshy receptacle, colored scarlet or other shade of red, bearing the achenes on its exterior. About six natural species are recognized, though these are so variable as to make it possible that they all belong to one multimorphic species. F. vesca is common throughout the northern Old World and northward in North America. It includes the alpine strawberry, hantlohy, and wood-strawberry (see below), was probably the first cultivated, and is the source of many artificial varieties, including the perpetuals. The Virginian or scarlet strawberry, F. virginiana, is common eastward in North America, and in the more robust variety Illinoensis extends perhaps to Oregon. The achenes, which in F. vesca are superficial, are in this species sunk in pits. It was the source of the famous Hovey's seedling, produced near Boston about 1840, and later of Wilson's Albany (or simply Wilson's), whose production marked an epoch in American strawberry-culture. In Chili and along the Pacific coast from San Francisco to Alaska grows the Chili strawberry, F. chilensis, a low stout densely hairy plant with thick leaves and large flowers, which has been the source of valuable hybrids in France and England. The Indian strawberry, F. indica, peculiar in its yellow petals and tasteless fruit, is only of ornamental value. The strawberry was not cultivated by the ancients; its culture in Europe began probably in the fifteenth or sixteenth century. It is now grown in great quantities in Europe and North America for its delicious subacid fruit, which is used fresh for dessert, and also canned or made into jam, and affords a syrup for flavoring drinks, ices, creams, etc. The varieties, which are mainly or wholly from the first three species above named, are numerous and constantly changing. See cuts under fragellum and Fragaria.

The strawberry grows underneath the nettle.

Shak., Hen. V., i. 1. 60.

Dr. Boteler said, of strawberries, "Doubtless God could have made a better berry, but doubtless God never did."

J. Walton, Complete Angler (ed. Bohn), p. 158.

Alpine strawberry, a European form of Fragaria vesca, sometimes distinguished as F. collina.—Ananas strawberry. Same as pine-strawberry.—Barren strawberry, in England, Potentilla Fragariastrum, resembling the strawberry in its trifoliate leaves and white flowers; in America, Waldsteinia fragarioides, having the leaves three-parted, but the flowers yellow. Neither has fleshy fruit.

—Bog-strawberry, the marsh fivefinger, Potentilla palustris. Britten and Holland. [Prov. Eng.]—Carolina strawberry, a misnomer of the pine-strawberry, once thought to have come from Carolina. —Chili strawberry. See def. and pine-strawberry.—Crushed strawberry, a crimson-red color of considerably reduced luminosity and somewhat reduced chroma. A color disk of 35 parts pure red, 7 parts artificial ultramarine, 48 parts velvet-black, and 7 parts white shows a crushed strawberry. —Hautboy strawberry. See hautboy, 2. —Pine-strawberry, a variety of the Chili strawberry (see def. above), so called from its pineapple flavor. Also Ananas strawberry. See Carolina strawberry. [Eng.]—Scarlet strawberry, specifically, the Virginian strawberry. [Eng.]—Strawberry-crown borer, a curculionid beetle, Tyloclerus.

ma fragariae, which lays its eggs at the crown of the strawberry-plant in the United States, and whose larva often seriously damages the crop. — Strawberry false-worm. See strawberry saw-fly (below), and strawberry-worm. — Strawberry leaf-roller, a tortricid moth, Phoxopteris fragariae, the larva of which rolls the leaves of the strawberry-plant in the United States; also, one of several other moths whose larva have this habit. See cut under leaf-roller. — Strawberry-leaves, a dukedom: from the eight strawberry-leaves on a ducal coronet. — Strawberry root-borer, a moth, Anarsia lineatella, whose larva burrows in the roots of this plant, and often does great damage. — Strawberry run. I looked up just in time to see a superb shooting star stream across the heavens. Nature, XXX. 455.
5. To stretch out in a line; hang or float at full length: as, streaming hair.

Standards and gonfalous 'twixt van and rear Stream in the air. Milton, P. L., v. 590.
Ribands streaming gay. Cooper, Task, iv. 541.

II. trans. 1. To discharge in a stream; cause to flow; pour out.

Had I as many eyes as thou hast wounds,
Weeping as fast as they stream forth thy blood.
Shak., J. C., iii. 1. 201.

Calanus told Onesicritus of a golden world, where meale was as plentiful as dust, and fountains streamed milke, hony, wine, and oyle. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 454.

2. To cause to float out; wave.

Many a time hath banish'd Norfolk fought,
Streaming the ensign of the Christian cross Against black pagans, Turks, and Saracens.
Shak., Rich. II., iv. 1. 94.

3†. To stripe or ray. See streaming, a. [Rare.]
The herald's mantle is streamed with gold. Bacon.

4. (a) In mining, to wash, as the superficial detritus, especially that accumulated in the beds of rivers, for the purpose of separating any valuable ore which it may contain. See placer.² The term stream, long in use in Cornwall, exclusively with reference to tin ores, seems hardly to have come into general use in any mining regions except those in which the ore of tin is mined. (b) In dyeing, to wash in running water, as silk, before putting in the dye. Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 40.—To stream a buoy. See buoy.

stream-anchor (strēm'ang'kor), n. Naut., an anchor of a size intermediate between the bower-anchor and the kedge. It is used for warping and like purposes. In the United States navy stream-anchors weigh from 400 to 1,500 pounds, and are about one fourth the weight of bower-anchors.

stream-cable (strēm'kā'h), n. The cable or hawser of the stream-anchor.

stream-clock (strēm'klok), n. [Tr. G. strom-uh.] A physiological instrument for determining the velocity of blood in a vessel.

stream-current (strēm'kur'ent), n. See the quotation, and also drift-current.

A current whose onward movement is sustained by the via a tergo of a drift-current is called a stream-current. Encyc. Brit., III. 19.

streamer (strēm'mér), n. [ME. streamer, streamere; < stream + -er.] 1. That which streams out, or hangs or floats at full length: applied to anything long and narrow, as a ribbon.

All twinkling with the dewdrops' sheen,
The brier-rose fell in streamers green.
Scott, L. of the L., i. 11.

(a) A long narrow flag; a pennon extended or flowing in the wind: same as pennant, 1 (a).

His brave fleet
With silken streamers the young Phoebus fanning.
Shak., Hen. V., iii. Troil., l. 6.

(b) A stream or column of light shooting upward or outward as in some forms of the aurora borealis.

He knew, by the streamers that shot so bright,
That spirits were riding the northern light.
Scott, L. of the L., ii. 8.

(c) A long flowing strip of ribbon, or feather, or something similar, used in decoration, especially in dress.

A most airy sort of blue and silver turban, with a streamer of plume on one side.
Charlotte Brontë, Vilette, xx.

(d) A long-exserted feather which streams away from the rest of the plumage of some birds: a pennant or standard. See cuts under Saniptera and standard-bearer.

2. In mining, a person who washes for stream-tin. See streaming.—3. The geometrid moth Antinea deridanti: an English collectors' name.

streamful (strēm'fūl), a. [< stream + -ful.] Full of streams or currents.

Like a ship despoiled of her sails,
Shov'd by the wind against the streamful tide.
Drayton, Legend of Pierce Gaveston, st. 105.

stream-gold (strēm'göld), n. See the quotation.

The gold of alluvial districts, called stream-gold or placer-gold, occurs, as well as alluvial tin, among the debris of the more ancient rocks. Cre. Dict., III. 295.

stream-ice (strēm'is), n. Pieces of drift or bay ice forming a ridge and following the line of current.

At 4 A. M. a seemingly close pack was seen to the eastward, but later it developed into stream-ice of small extent. A. W. Greely, Arctic Service, p. 67.

streaminess (strēm'ni-nes), n. The quality or state of being streamy.

I give the case of a star-group which is certainly not the most remarkable for streaminess. R. A. Proctor, Universe of Stars (2d ed., 1878), p. 22.

streaming (strēm'ing), n. [Verbal n. of stream, v.] 1. In tin-mining, the washing of tin ore from the detritus with which it is associated. The now almost entirely exhausted deposits of detrital tin ore in Cornwall and Devon were called streams, because they occur chiefly in or near the bottoms of the valleys and adjacent to the present streams, or in the manner of deposits formed by streams, analogous to the channels of the Californian and the gutters of the Australian miners; the miners were themselves called streamers; the localities where streaming was carried on, stream-works; and the ore obtained, stream-tin.

2. In biol., the peculiar flowing motion of the particles of protoplasm in an amoeba or other rhizopod, by which the form of the animalcule changes or pseudopods are protruded; also, the similar circulation or rotation of the protoplasm of some plant-cells. See protoplasm, and rotation of protoplasm (under rotation).

streaming (strēm'ing), p. a. In her., issuing, as rays of light: as, rays streaming from the dexter chief.

streamless (strēm'les), a. [< stream + -less.] Not traversed by streams; unwatered. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 758.

streamlet (strēm'let), n. [< stream + -let.] A small stream; a rivulet; a rill.

Unnumber'd glittering streamlets play'd,
And hurried every where their waters sheen.
Thomson, Castle of Indolence, l. 3.

stream-line (strēm'lin), n. See line 2, and line of flow (under flow).—Stream-line surface. See surface.

streamling (strēm'ling), n. [< stream + -ling.] Same as streamlet.

A thousand Streamlings that n'er saw the Sun,
With tribute silver to his service run.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii. The Captaines.

stream-tin (strēm'tin), n. In mining, tin ore, or oxid of tin, obtained in streaming (which see).

stream-wheel (strēm'hwēl), n. An undershot wheel, or current-wheel.

stream-works (strēm'wërks), n. sing. and pl. In mining, a locality where the detrital deposits are washed in order to procure the valuable metal or ore which they may contain; alluvial washings, or surface mining. The words stream-works and stream (v. t.) are rarely, if ever, used except with reference to the separation of tin ore from detrital deposits.

streamwort (strēm'wört), n. A plant of Lindley's order Haloragaceæ. [Rare.]

streamy (strēm'ni), a. [Early mod. E. also streamy; < stream + -y.] 1. Abounding in streams. (a) Full of running water or of springs.

Acadia
(However streamy, now adust and dry, Deny'd the Goddess Water.
Prior, First Hymn of Callimachus.

(b) Full of or emitting streaming rays of light.
In streamy sparkles, kindling all the skies,
From pole to pole the trail of glory flies.
Pope, Iliad, xiii. 321.

2. Having the form of a beam or stream of light.

street, n. An obsolete form of street.

Cf. strag,¹ strag.²] 1†. A paved road; a highway.

This grand-child, great as he [Muhomutius], those four proud streets begin That each way cross this Isle, and bounds did them allow.
Drayton, Polyolbion, viii. 74.

There were at that time [fifth year after the Conquest] in England four great roads, . . . of which two ran lengthways through the island, and two crossed it, . . . Watlinge-strete, Fosse, Hikenilde-strete, and Erning-strete. Guest, Origines Celtice, II. 218.

2. A public way or road, whether paved or unpaved, in a village, town, or city, ordinarily including a sidewalk or sidewalks and a roadway, and having houses or town lots on one or both sides: a main way, in distinction from a lane or alley: as, a fashionable street; a street of shops. Abbreviated St., st. Compare road. 3. Strictly, the word excludes the houses, which are on the street; but in a very common use it includes the land and houses, which are then in the street: as, a house in High Street. In law, street sometimes includes as much of the surface, and as much of the space above and of the soil or depth beneath, as may be needed for the ordinary works which the local authorities may decide to execute on or in a street, including sidewalks.

Up Fish Street! down Saint Magnus' Corner!
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iv. s. 1.

3. The way for vehicles, between the curbs, as distinguished from the sidewalks: as, to walk in the street.—4. Hence, a path or passageway inclosed between continuous lines of objects; a track; a lane.

It seemed to be, as it were, a continued street of shippes.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 435.

I was ushered through an actual street of servitors.
Disraeli, Vivian Grey, iii. 8.

5†. A path; a way.

Than makest thou his pees with his sovereignty,
And bringest him out of the crooked streete.
Chaucer, A. B. C., l. 70.

While I ran by the most secret streets,
Eschewing still the common haunted track.
Surrey, Enclid, ii. 975.

6. The inhabitants of a street collectively. [Colloq.]

All the whole street will hate us, and the world
Point me out cruel. Widdellton, Chaste Maid, v. 2.

Grub Street. See Grub-street.—Lombard Street. See Lombard.² 1.—Queer Street. See queer.—Street Arab. See Arab. 2.—Street broker. See broker. The street, a street (as Wall Street in New York) or locality where merchants or stock-brokers congregate for business, the commercial exchange: as, it is rumored on the street.

Scott, Bride of Lammermoor, vii.

10. In colors, the relative property possessed by a pigment of imparting a color to and modifying the shade of any other pigment to which it is added. Thus, one pound of lampblack added to 100 pounds of white lead produces a dark-gray shade, but one pound of ivory-black added in the same way would have little effect on the white.

11. In the five arts, boldness of conception or treatment.

Carracci's strength, Correggio's softer line.

Pope, Epistle to Jervas, l. 37.

12. In soap-making. See the quotation.

A peculiar phenomenon may be remarked in the cooling [of a little of the soap placed on a glass plate], which affords a good criterion of the quality of the soap. When there is formed around the little patch an opaque zone, a fraction of an inch broad, this is supposed to indicate complete saponification, and is called the strength; when it is absent, the soap is said to want its strength. When this zone soon vanishes after being distinctly seen, the soap is said to have false strength.

Trö, Diet., III. 852.

On the strength (milit. and naval), on the muster-rolls, [Colloq.]

The colonel had put the widow woman on the strength; she was no longer an unrecognized waif, but had her regimental position.

Arch. Forbes, in Eng. Illust. Mag., VI. 525.

On or upon the strength of, in reliance upon the value of; on the faith of; as, to do something on the strength of another's promise.

Strengthening plaster. See plaster.—Syn. To invigorate, fortify, brace, nerve, steel, corroborate, support, heighten.

II. intrans. To grow strong or stronger.

The young disease, that must subside at length, grows with his growth, and strengthens with his strength.

Pope, Essay on Man, ii. 136.

strengthen (streng'thin), v. [< strength + -en.] 1. trans. To make strong or stronger; add strength to, either physical, legal, or moral:

confirm; establish: as, to strengthen a limb; to strengthen an obligation; to strengthen a claim; to strengthen authority.

Charge Joshua, and encourage him, and strengthen him.

Deut. xii. 28.

Let noble Warwick, Cobham, and the rest . . .

With powerful policy strengthen themselves.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., i. 2. 58.

About in the see
No Prince was of better strenuities.
Hakluyt's Voyages, 1. 206.

strenuosity (stren-ū-sŭ'z-i-ti), n. [< strenuus + -ity.] 1. The state or character of being strenuous; strenuousness.—2. A strained effect, or a straining for effect, as in a literary composition.

Strenuosity in style is not quite the same thing as strength.
The Academy, Jan. 30, 1886, p. 73.

strenuous (stren-ū-us), a. [< L. strenuus, quick, active, brisk, vigorous; cf. Gr. στερεός, firm, hard, σπρῆγς, strong.] 1. Strong; vigorous; active; pushing.

Him whose strenuous tongue
Can burst Joy's grape against his palate fine.

Keats, Melancholy.

2. Eagerly pressing or urgent; energetic; zealous; ardent; bold; earnest; valiant; intrepid.

To strenuous minds there is an inquietude in overquietness.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., 1. 33.

This scheme encountered strenuous opposition in the council.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

3. Necessitating vigor or energy; accompanied by labor or exertion.

What more oft, in nations grown corrupt,
Than to love bondage more than liberty.
Bondage with ease than strenuous liberty?

Milton, S. A., 1. 271.

Worldlings revelling in the fields
Of strenuous illness.
Wordsworth, Memory.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Energetic, resolute.

strenuously (stren-ū-us-lī), adv. In a strenuous manner; with eager and pressing zeal; ardently; boldly; vigorously; actively.

strenuousness (stren-ū-us-ness), n. The state or character of being strenuous; eagerness; earnestness; active zeal.

streper, v. An old spelling of stripl.

streper (strep'ent), a. [< L. streper(-t)s, ppr. of strepere, make a noise, rumble, murmur.] Noisy; loud. [Rare.]

Peace to the streper horn!

Shenstone, Rural Elegance.

Strepera (strep'e-rā), n. [NL. (Lesson, 1831). < L. strepere, make a noise.] An Australian genus of corvine passerine birds, typical of the subfamily Streperinae, having long wings and naked nostrils. Also called Coronea (Gould, 1837). There are 7 species, commonly called crow-shrikes, of a black, blackish-brown, or gray color, more or less varied with white or rufous. The type is Corvus graculinus of White, the noisy roller of Latham, Coracias or Gracula or Barita strepera of various authors, now Strepera graculina. It is glossy black, with the base of the tail and an alar speculum white, the iris yellow. The length is 18 inches. S. crissalis, arguta, intermedia, cuneicauda (or anaphoneusis; see squeaker), melanoptera, and fuliginosa are the other species.

Crow-shrike (Strepera graculina).

streperine (strep'e-rin), a. [< Strepera + -in.] Of or pertaining to birds of the genus Strepera.

streperous (strep'e-rus), a. [< L. strepere, make a noise, rumble, murmur, + -ous. Cf. obstreperous.] Noisy; loud; boisterous. [Rare.]

In a streperous eruption it [the bay or laurel] riseth against the.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 6.

strephtome (stref'ō-tōm), n. [< Gr. σπρῆγς, twist, turn, + -tōm, < τῆναι, twine, cut.] A corker-saw-like needle used in an operation for the radical cure of inguinal hernia.

Streptores (strep-i-tō'rēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of streptor*, < L. strepere, make a noise; see streper.] A group of insectivorous birds, established by Blyth in 1849 for those Cuvierian Passerines which are non-passerine, and primarily divided into Syndactyl, Zygodactyl, and Heterodactyl. See these words.

streptos (strep-i-tō'sō), adv. [It., < strepita, noise, < L. strepitus, noise; see strepituous.] In music, in an impetuous, boisterous, noisy manner.

strepituous (strep'i-tus), a. [< L. strepitus, noise, < strepere, make a noise; see streper.] Noisy.

strepsicere (strep'si-sēr), n. [< strepsiceros.] An antelope with twisted horns; a strepsiceros.

strepsiceros (strep-sis'e-rus), n. [NL., < L. strepsiceros, < Gr. σπρῆγς, twist, turn, + κῆρυξ, a horn, called by the Africans addax.] 1. Some antelope with twisted horns, as the koodoo; originally, perhaps, the addax.—2. [cap.] [NL. (Hamilton Smith, 1827).] A genus of antelopes with twisted or spiral horns. The only species now left in the genus is S. kudu, the koodoo. See cut under koodoo.

Strepsilas (strep'si-las), n. [NL. (Illiger, 1811). < Gr. σπρῆγς, a turning round, < σπρῆγιν (aor. σπρῆγιν), twist, turn, + λίαν, liar, a stone.] The typical genus of a subfamily Strepsilinae; the turnstones. The bill is short, constricted at the base, tapering to a sharp point, with ascending gony longer than the mandibular ramus, short and broad nasal fossae, and short shallow grooves in the under mandible. The legs are short and stout, with the tarsus scutellate in front and reticulate on the sides and back, and four toes, cleft to the base. There are 2 species, S. interpres, the common turnstone, and S. melanocophthalmus of the North Pacific, the black-headed turnstone, perhaps only a variety of the other. The genus was also called Cinobus, Arenaria, and Morinella. See cuts under Prossirotes and turnstone.

strepsipter (strep-sip'tēr), n. [< NL. Strepsiptera.] A member of the Strepsiptera.

Strepsiptera (strep-sip'te-rā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of strepsipterus*; see strepsipterous.]

1. An order of insects, named by Kirby in 1833 from the twisted wings, synonymous with Chiroptera of Latreille, and corresponding to the family Stylopidae. The fore wings are mere twisted filaments or pseudelytra; the hind wings are expansive and fan-shaped; the females are wingless. The strepsipterans are parasitic on hymenopterous insects, especially bees and wasps. They are now regarded as anomalous Coleoptera degraded by parasitism. See cut under Stylops. 2. In Gegenbaur's system of classification, a family of neopterous insects, forming with Phryganida the suborder Trichoptera.

strepsipteral (strep-sip'te-rāl), a. [< strepsipterous + -al.] Same as strepsipterous.

strepsipteran (strep-sip'te-ran), n. and a. [< NL. Strepsiptera + -an.] I. n. A strepsipter.

II. a. Same as strepsipterous.

strepsipterous (strep-sip'te-rus), a. [*< NL. strepsipterus, < Gr. σπρῆγιν (aor. σπρῆγιν), twist, turn, + πτερόν, a wing.] Having twisted front wings, as a stylus; of or pertaining to the Strepsiptera; rhipipterous. Also strepsipteran, strepsipteral. See cut under Stylops.

strepsirrhinal, strepsirrhine (strep-si-rī'nāl), a. [< strepsirrhine + -al.] Same as strepsirrhine.

strepsirrhine, strepsirrhine (strep'si-rīn), a. and n. [*< NL. strepsirrhinus, < Gr. σπρῆγιν (aor. σπρῆγιν), turn, twist, + ῥῆγιν (prp.), nose.] I. a. Having twisted or curved nostrils, as a lemur; of or pertaining to the Strepsirrhini; neither catarrhine nor platyrrhine, as a primate. Also strepsirrhine.

II. n. Any lemur or prosimian; a member of the Strepsirrhini.

Strepsirrhini, Strepsirhini (strep-si-rī'nī), n. pl. [NL. (Geoffroy); see strepsirrhine.] The lemuroid mammals, or lemurs; so called from the twisted nostrils, in distinction from Catarrhini and Platyrrhini. In these animals the nostrils are at the corners of the snout, and somewhat comma-shaped, as is usual in mammals, instead of having the more human character of those of the higher Primates. The term is exactly synonymous with Prosimia in Lemuroidea, excepting that in early usages of all three of these names of lemurs the so-called flying lemurs (Galeopithecidae) were wrongly included, these being insectivorous and not primate mammals, now always excluded from the strepsirrhines. Also Strepsirrhina, Strepsirrhini, and Strepsirrhina.

Streptanthus (strep-tan'thus), n. [NL. (Nuttall, 1825), so called from the greatly twisted claws of the petals; < Gr. σπρῆγιν, twisted (< σπρῆγιν, twist, turn), + ἄνθος, flower.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Crucifera and tribe Arabideae, distinguished from the type-genus Arabis by a calyx commonly of large size, longer and sometimes connate stamens, and petals usually borne on a twisted claw. There are about 16 species, natives of North America and chiefly of the western United States. They are smooth annuals or perennials, with entire or lyrate leaves and commonly bractless flowers, which are purple or sometimes white or yellow, and in some species pendulous. S. obtusifolius, a pink-flowered species, has been called Arkansas cabbage.

streptobacteria (strep-tō-bak-tē'ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σπρῆγιν, twisted, + NL. bacteria.] A supposed bacterium, consisting of a chain of short rod-formed bacteria linked together. Ziegler, Pathol. Anat. (trans.), i. 185.

Streptocarpus (strep-tō-kār'p-us), n. [NL. (Lindley, 1828), so called from the spirally twisted fruit; < Gr. σπρῆγιν, twisted, + καρπός, fruit.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Gesneracea, tribe Cyclantherae, and subtribe Holmogonaceae. It is characterized by flowers with an elongated corolla-tube which is much enlarged above, and contains two perfect stamens and a linear ovary imperfectly four-lobed by the protrusion of lobed placenta densely covered on their margins with ovules, and becoming a spirally twisted capsule which is linear and terete and splits into valves coherent at the base and apex. There are about 15 species, natives of South Africa and of Madagascar. They are woolly or downy herbs, chiefly with spreading radical leaves or with a single leaf (a persistent cotyledon), sometimes with a stem bearing opposite leaves. The handsome flowers are mostly pale purple or blue; they form a many-flowered cyme, or are borne few or singly upon their peduncle. S. Danatii, a remarkable species from the Transvaal mountains, is cultivated for its peculiar solitary grayish-green leaf, prostrate on the ground and over 3 feet long, with thick fleshy veins and clothed beneath with close reddish down, and for its bright-red tubular deurved flowers, of which there are sometimes over one hundred on a scape at once. Several other species are in cultivation under glass, especially S. Watsoni, a hybrid with several large leaves and rich crimson flowers, and S. Rezii, with blue flowers. They are known as Cape primroses.

streptococchemia, streptococchæmia (strep-tō-kē-kē'mi-ā), n. [NL., < streptococcus + Gr. αἷμα, blood.] The presence of streptococci in the blood.

streptococci (strep-tō-kok'si), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σπρῆγιν, twisted, + κόκκος, a berry.] A chain of micrococci linked together, occurring in some specific diseases. Zuehr, Pathol. Anat. (trans.), i. 185.

Streptoneura (strep-tō-nū'rā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of streptoneurus; see streptoneurous.] A branch of an ophthalmic nerve, in which the long loop of visceral nerves embracing the intestine is caught and twisted into a figure-of-8 by the torsion which the animal undergoes in its development. The Streptoneura are divided into two orders, Zygnobranchia and Azygnobranchia. They include all the antileptical gastropods except the opisthobranchs and pulmonifers. The nearest synonym is Prosobranchiata.

streptoneural (strep-tō-nū'rāl), a. [< streptoneurous + -al.] Same as streptoneurous.

streptoneurous (strep-tō-nū'rūs), a. [*< NL. streptoneurus, < Gr. σπρῆγιν, twisted, + νῆρς, a nerve.] Having twisted (visceral) nerves; specifically, pertaining to the Streptoneura, or having their characters.

Streptopus (strep'tō-pus), n. [NL. (F. A. Michaux, 1803), so called from the abruptly bent flower-stalk; < Gr. σπρῆγιν, twisted, + πῶς = Ε. foot.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, of the order Liliaceae and tribe Polygonateae. It is characterized by nodding solitary or twin axillary flowers divided into six more or less spreading segments, with a filiform or columnar style which is three-cleft at the apex. There are 4 species, natives of Europe, North America, and temperate parts of Asia. They are rather delicate plants from a short and densely fiber-bearing or a creeping rootstock, with a simple or sparingly branched stem, bearing numerous ovate or lanceolate alternate sessile or clasping leaves. The small rose-colored or whitish flowers hang upon slender recurved or reflexed peduncles, followed by small roundish berries with numerous pale oblong or curving striate seeds. They are known by the name twisted-stalk, translating the genus name, S. amplexifolius is found in Europe, and together with S. roseus, in northern North America, and southward in the mountains.

streptospondylia (strep-tō-spon-dil'i-ā), n. Same as streptospondylous.

streptospondylous (strep-tō-spon-dil'us), a. [*< NL. streptospondylus, < Gr. σπρῆγιν, twisted, + σπονδυλός, σπονδυλός, a vertebra.] Having the character of the vertebral articulations reversed, or supposed to be so, as in the genus Streptospondylus.

Streptospondylus (strep-tō-spon-dil'us), n. [NL. (Meyer); see streptospondylous.] A genus of fossil crocodiles, founded on remains represented by vertebrae of the Wealden and Oolitic formations. It was originally placed among the opisthocelous Crocodylia, subsequently among the amphicele. The genus agrees with such forms as Telosaurus, which have the external nuchal terminal, and is placed by Huxley in the family Telosauridae.

streptostylic (strep-tō-stil'ik), a. [< NL. streptostylicus, < Gr. σπρῆγιν, twisted, + στυλή, a pillar.] Having the quadrate bone freely articulated with the skull, as in ophidian and saurian reptiles; not monimostylic; of or pertaining to the Streptostylia.

Streptostylia (strep-tō-stil'i-kā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of streptostylicus; see streptostylic.] Streptostylic reptiles, a prime division of ordinary reptiles (as snakes and lizards), having an articulated quadrate bone and a pair of extracoeleal copulatory organs; opposed to Monimostylia. They were divided into Ophi- dra and Sauru (including Amphisbaena). Stam- mus, 3:56.

Streptothrix (strep'tō-thrīks), n. [NL. (F. Cohn, & Gr. στρεπτός, twisted, + τρίξ, the hair.) A genus standing probably intermediate between the bacteria and the fungi proper. It comprises very minute, colorless, branching filaments, growing in interlacing masses like the mycelium of fungi. S. toletii was found by Cohn in the concretions of the lacrimal canals of the eye.

stress¹ (stres), v. t. [OF. estreier, estressir, estrechier, estroyssir, etc., straiten, contract. < ML. as if stricture*, < L. strictus, pp. of stringere, draw together, compress; see stringent, *strain*¹, strict. Cf. distress.] 1. To straiten; constrain; press; urge; hamper. [Rare.]

If the magistrate be so stressed that he cannot protect those that are pious and peaceable, the Lord help.
Waterhouse, Apol. for Learning, p. 155. (Latham.)

2. In mech., to subject to a stress.

The theory of elastic solids . . . shows that when a solid is stressed the state of stress is completely determined when the amount and direction of the three principal stresses are known. Thomson and Tait, Nat. Phil., § 832.

3. To lay the stress, emphasis, or accent on; emphasize.

If he had eased his heart in stressing the first syllable, it was only temporary relief.
G. Meredith, The Egoist, xviii.

stress¹ (stres), n. [*stress*¹, v.] 1. Constraining, urging, or impelling force; constraining power or influence; pressure; urgency; violence.

By stress of weather driven,
At last they landed. Dryden, Æneid, i. 503.

2. In mech., an elastic force, whether in equilibrium with an external force or not; the force called into play by a strain. This word was introduced into mechanics by Rankine in 1855. In the following year Sir William Thomson used the word as synonymous with pressure, or an external force balanced by elastic forces. The terminology has been further confused by the use of Rankine's word strain, by Thomson and others, as a synonym for deformation. The words stress and strain are needed in the senses originally given to them by Rankine; while they both have familiar equivalents to which they have been wrested. At present, some writers use them in one way and some in the other.

In this paper the word strain will be used to denote the change of volume and figure constituting the deviation of a molecule of a solid from that condition which it preserves when free from the action of external forces; and the word stress will be used to denote the force, or combination of forces, which such a molecule exerts in tending to recover its free condition, and which, for a state of equilibrium, is equal and opposite to the combination of external forces applied to it.

A stress is an equilibrating application of force to a body. . . . It will be seen that I have deviated slightly from Mr. Rankine's definition of the word stress, as I have applied it to the direct action experienced by a body from the matter around it, and not, as proposed by him, to the elastic reaction of the body equal and opposite to that action. Thomson, Phil. Trans., CLXVI. 457.

3. Stretch; strain; effort.

Though the faculties of the mind are improved by exercise, yet they must not be put to a stress beyond their strength. Locke, Conduct of the Understanding, xxviii.

4. Weight; importance; special force or significance; emphasis.

Consider how great a stress he laid upon this duty, . . . and how earnestly he recommended it. Bp. Atterbury.

This, on which the great stress of the business depends.
Locke. (Johnson.)

So rare the sweep, so nice the art,
That lays no stress on any part.
Lowell, Appledore.

5. The relative loudness with which certain syllables or parts of syllables are pronounced; emphasis in utterance; accent; ictus. In elocution, initial, opening, or radical stress is stress or emphasis at the beginning; medial or median stress is that in the middle; and close, final, or vanishing stress is stress at the end of a vowel-sound. The union of initial and final is compound stress, that of all three stresses is thorough stress.—Antielastic stress. See antielastic.—Axis of a stress, one of three mutually perpendicular lines meeting at any point of a body in which a given stress tends to produce only elongation or contraction, without any tangential action.—Center of stress. See *center*¹.—Close stress. See def. 5.—Composition of stresses. See composition of displacements, under composition.—Compound stress. See def. 5.—Concurrent stress and strain. See concurrent.—Final stress. See def. 5.—Homogeneous stress, in mech., a stress which affects alike all similar and similarly turned portions of matter within the boundary within which the stress is said to be homogeneous.—Initial stress. See def. 5.—Lateral stress. See lateral.—Medial, median stress. See def. 5.—Normal stress, a stress such that its tendency to change the relative positions of two parts of a solid always acts along the normals to the surface separating those parts. Such a stress consists of three extensive or compressive stresses along three rectangular axes.—Orthogonal stress, (a) Relatively to a homogeneous strain, a stress which neither increases nor diminishes the work of producing that strain. (b) Relatively to another stress, a stress orthogonal to a strain perfectly concurrent with the other stress. Perfectly concurrent stress, (a) Relatively to another stress, a stress equal to that other multiplied by a real number. (b) Relatively to an infinitesimal homogeneous strain, a stress such that, if the strain be so compounded with a rotation as to produce a pure strain, the motions of the particles upon the surface of a sphere relatively to its center represent in magnitude and direction the components of the stress.—Principal tension of a stress, a component of the stress along one of its axes.—Radical stress. See def. 5.—Shearing stress, a stress tending to produce a shear.—Storm and stress. See storm.—Synclastic stress, a stress upon a plate tending to give it a positive curvature.—Tangential stress, a stress such that its tendency to change the relative positions of two parts of a solid always acts along the tangents to the surface separating those parts. Such a stress consists of three shearing stresses having orthogonal axes.—The principal axes of stress. See axis.—Thorough stress. See def. 5.—Type of a stress. See type.—Vanishing stress, an increasing loudness toward the end of a vowel-sound, producing the effect of a jerk. See def. 5.—Syn. 5. Accent, etc. See emphasis.

stress² (stres), n. [*stress*¹, v.] In part an aphetic form of distress, q. v.] 1. Distress; difficulty; extremity; pinch. [Obsolete or archaic.]

And help the pure that ar in stres
Oppress and heret myrcles.
Lauder, Dewtie of Kyngis (E. E. T. S.), i. 463.

The agony and stress
Of pitying love. Whittier, The Two Rabbits.

2. In law: (a) The act of distraining; distress. (b) A former mode of taking up indictments for circuit courts.

stress-diagram (stres'di-a-gram), n. See diagram.

stressless (stres'les), a. [*stress*¹ + -less.] Without stress; specifically, unaccented. Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 788.

stress-sheet (stres'shet), n. In bridge-building, same as strain-sheet.

stretch (streech), v. [< ME. streechen (also unassimilated strecken, whence mod. E. dial. streck, streak, var. strake) (pret. straughte, straught, strahle, streahte, streichte*, streichte, strehcte, pp. straught, straugt, streicht, streich, streich), < AS. streccean (pret. strechte, pp. strecht) = OFries. strekka = D. strekken = MLG. strecken = OHG. strechen, MHG. G. strecken = Sw. sträcka = Dan. strække, draw out, stretch; connected with the adj. AS. stræc, strec, strong, violent (lit. stretched?), = MHG. strac (strack-), G. strack, straight; √ strak, perhaps orig. *√ srak, a var. of √ rak in *retch*², reck, raich); otherwise akin to L. stringere, pp. strictus, draw tight (see stringent, *strain*¹, strait), and to Gr. σπάζω, twisted tight. Hence *straight*¹, orig. pp. of stretch. Connection with string, *strong*¹, etc., is uncertain.] I. trans. 1†. To draw (out); pull (out).

But stert vp stithly, straught out a swerde.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), i. 1240.

2. To draw out to full length; extend; expand; spread; as, to stretch one's self; to stretch the wings; to stretch one's legs; hence, sometimes, to tighten; make tense or taut.

Redli, of your rigt arm that ouer rome streyt,
I se wel the significance.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), i. 2957.

I have stretched my legs up Tottenham Hill to overtake you.
I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 43.

3. To extend, or cause to reach or extend, lengthwise, or between specified points; as, to stretch a rope from one point to another.

My wings shall be Stretch'd out no further then from thee to thee.
Quarles, Embleims, iii. 12.

Phœnicia is stretched by some . . . even to Egypt, all alongst that Sea-coast. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 95.

A clothes-line with some clothes on it . . . is stretched between the trunks of some stunted willows.
Ruskin, Elements of Drawing, iii.

4. To draw out or extend in any direction by the application of force; draw out by tensile stress; as, to stretch cloth; to stretch a rubber band beyond its strength.

My business and that of my wife is to stretch new boots for millionaires.
Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 623.

5. To distend or expand forcibly or violently; strain by the exercise of force; subject to stress, literally or figuratively.

Come, stretch thy chest, and let thy eyes spout blood.
Shak., T. and C., iv. 5. 10.

They that stretch his infallibility further do they know not what.
Selden, Table-Talk, p. 50.

6. To extend or strain too far; impair by straining; do violence to; exaggerate; as, to stretch the truth.—7†. To exert; strain.

Till my veins
And sinews crack, I'll stretch my utmost strength.
Beau. and Fl. (5), Faithful Friends, iii. 3.

Stretching their best abilities to expresse their loues.
Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 182.

8. To reach or hold out; put forth; extend.

He drough oute a letter that was wrapped in a cloth of silke, and straught it to the kynge.
Martin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 639.

Stretch thine hand unto the poor. Eccles. vii. 32.

9. To cause to lie or fall extended at full length; as, to stretch an opponent on the ground by a blow.—10. To hang. [Slang.]

The night before Larry was stretched.

R. Burrows, in Prout's Reliques, p. 267.

To stretch a point. Same as to strain a point (which see, under point).

II. intrans. 1. To extend; reach; be continuous over a distance; be drawn out in length or in breadth, or both; spread.

Twenty fadme of brede the armes straughte.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 2058.

The town stretcheth along the bottom of the haven, back on the West with a rocky mountain.

Sandys, Travels, p. 10.

2. To be extended or to bear extension without breaking, as elastic substances; attain greater length; literally or figuratively.

The inner membrane, . . . because it would stretch and yield, remained unbroken.
Boyle.

The terms . . . must be very elastic if they would stretch widely enough to include all the poems.

O. W. Holmes, Emerson, xiv.

3. To go beyond the truth; exaggerate. [Colloq.]

What an allay do we find to the credit of the most probable event that is reported by one who uses to stretch!
Government of the Tongue.

4. Naut., to sail by the wind under all sail.—

5. To make violent efforts in running.—Stretching convulsions, tetanic convulsions which, acting through the extensor muscles, straighten the limbs.—Stretch out! an order to a boat's crew to pull hard.

stretch (streech), n. [< stretch, v.] 1. A stretching or straining, especially a stretching or straining beyond measure; as, a stretch of authority.

A great and sudden stretch or contortion.

Ray, Works of Creation, p. 287.

It is only by a stretch of language that we can be said to desire that which is inconceivable.

W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 229.

2. A state of tension; strain; as, to be on the stretch.

Those put a lawful authority upon the stretch, to the abuse of power, under the colour of prerogative.

or plate, frequently having a pearly luster, by friction of which against another surface brought into contact with it a creaking sound is produced. These organs are variously situated on the wings, elytra, legs, abdomen, thorax, and even the head.

stridulation (strid'ū-lā'shən), n. [<stridulate + -ion.] The act, process, or function of stridulating; the power of so doing, or the thin, harsh, creaking noise thus produced; a shrilling.

Stridulation is effected by rubbing together hard or rough parts of the body, often specially modified in various ways for that purpose, being thus not vocalization or phonation. It is highly characteristic of many homopterous insects, as the cicadas; of many orthopterous insects, as various locusts or grasshoppers; and of some coleopterous insects, or beetles. It rarely occurs in lepidopterous insects, but has been observed in some butterflies and moths, and also in a few spiders, as of the genus Theridion. Those homopterous insects in which it is specially marked are named Stridulantiæ.

stridulator (strid'ū-lā-tor), n. [<stridulate + -or.] An insect which stridulates, shrills, or chirrs; that which is stridulatory.

stridulatory (strid'ū-lā-tō-ri), a. [<stridulate + -ory.] Pertaining to stridulators or stridulation; stridulant or stridulous; shrill or shrilling; chirring.

stridulous (strid'ū-lus), a. [<L. stridulus, creaking, rattling, hissing, < stridere, creak; see strident.] Making a small harsh sound; having a thin, squeaky sound; squeaky; creaking.

To make them [the old men] garrulous, as grasshoppers are stridulous.

Chapman, Blad., iii., Commentary.

Stridulous angina. Same as laryngismus stridulus (which see, under laryngismus).

strier, v. t. A Middle English form of strew.

strife (strif), n. [<ME. strif, < OF. estrief, < Ice. strith, strife, contention, pain, grief, = Sw. Dan. strid, combat, contention, = OS. OFries. strid = D. strijd = OHG. MHG. strit, G. streit, strife, = OL. stlis (gen. stlit-), L. lis (lit-), strife, litigation (see litigate); from the verb, Ice. stridha, strive, contend, etc.: see stride. Cf. strive.] 1. A striving or effort to do one's best; earnest attempt or endeavor.

With strife to please you, day exceeding day.

Shak., All's Well, Epil.

2. Emulative contention or rivalry; active struggle for superiority; emulation.

Weep with equal strife

Who should weep most. Shak., Lucrece, i. 1791.

Thus gods contended (noble strife, Worthy the heavenly mind.)

Who most should do to soften anxious life.

Congreve, To the Earl of Godolphin.

3. Antagonistic contention; contention characterized by anger or enmity; discord; conflict; quarrel; as, strife of the elements.

Sith for me ye fight, to me this grace

Both yield, to stay your deadly strife a space.

Spenser, F. Q., ii. vi. 33.

Twenty of them fought in this black strife.

Shak., R. and J., iii. 1. 153.

To take strife, to enter into conflict.

For which he took with Rome and Cesar strife.

Chaucer, Good Women, i. 595.

= Syn. 2 and 3. Strife, Contention. These words agree in being very general, in having a good sense possible, and in seeming elevated or poetical when applied to the organized quarrels of war or to anything more than oral disputes. Strife is the stronger. Contention often indicates the more continued and methodical effort, and hence is more often the word for rivalry in effort to possess something. Such a rivalry, when definite in form and limited in time, is a contest; as, the contests of the Greek games. A contention that is forcible, violent, exhausting, or attended with real or figurative convulsions or contortions, is a struggle. See battle, encounter.

strifeful (strif'fūl), a. [<strife + -ful.] Full of strife; contentious; discordant.

But strifful mind and diverse qualitie

Drew them in partes, and each made others foe.

Spenser, F. Q., ii. ii. 13.

strig (strig), n. [Origin obscure.] 1. The footstalk of a flower, leaf, or fruit. Ure, Diet., i. 302.—2. The tang of a sword-blade. See tang.

strig (strig), v. t.: pret. and pp. strigged, pp. strigging. [<strig, n.] To remove the footstalk from; as, to strig currants.

striga (strī'gā), n.: pl. strigæ (-jē). [NL., < L. striga, a swath, furrow, < stringere, draw tight, contract; see strict.] 1. In bot., a sharp-pointed appressed bristle or hair-like scale, constituting a species of pubescence in plants.—2. In zool., a streak or stripe; a stria.—3. In arch., a flute of a column.

strigate (strī'gāt), a. [<NL. strigatus*, < L. striga, a furrow; see striga.] In entom., same as strigose.

Striges (strī'jēz), n. pl. [NL., < L. strix (strig-), an owl.] The owls, or Strigidæ in a broad sense, as a suborder of Raptores; the nocturnal birds of prey. The physiognomy is peculiar by reason of the lateral expansion, lengthwise contraction, and dilapic thickening of the skull, which is often asymmetrical. The eyes look forward, not laterally as in other birds, and are set in a peculiar disk of radiated feathers more or less completely formed, the feathers of the front being antrorse and adpressed, hiding the base of the bill. This is the facial disk, of which some radiating feathers of peculiar shape and texture constitute a ruff. The eyes are very large, with a peculiarly shaped eyeball, the cornea being protuberant, and with the sclerotic presenting a figure somewhat like a short acorn in its cup; the iris is capable of great movement, dilating and contracting the pupil more than is usual in birds. The ear-parts are very large, often unlike on opposite sides of the head, and provided with a movable external flap, the operculum, sometimes of great extent. The tufts of feathers, or so-called "ears," of many owls are the corniplumes or plumicorns. The bill is peculiar in that the nostrils open at the edge of the cere rather than in its substance, and the tibiae are never toothed. There are four toes, of which the outer is versatile and shorter than the inner, with three of its joints together shorter than the fourth joint. The claws are all long, sharp, and curved, and the middle one is sometimes pectinate. The feathers lack after-shafts, and the plumage is peculiarly soft and blended, conferring a noiseless flight. The birds have no ambiens muscle, one pair of intrinsic syringeal muscles, a nude oil-gland, long clubbed caeca, short intestines, moderately muscular gizzard, capacious gullet without special crop, a peculiar structure of the tarsometatarsi and shoulder-joint, a manubriated and double-notched or entire sternum, basipterygoid processes, and spongy maxillopalatines and lacrymals. The suborder is divided into two families, Strigidae and Alucoideae. Nyctaraptes is a synonym. See cuts under barra-owl, bracate, Bubo, kaw-owl, Otus, Nyctala, owl, snow-owl, and Strix.

Strigidae (strij'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Strix (Strig-) + -idae.] The owls as a family of strigine or nocturnal birds of prey of the order Raptores; used in three senses. (a) Same as Striges, including all owls. (b) Same as Alucoideae, including only the barn-owls. (c) Including all owls excepting the Alucoideae. In this sense the distinctive characters are the furculum not ankylosed to the double-notched or fenestrated sternum, the middle claw not pectinate, and the facial disk incomplete or not triangular.

strigil (strij'il), n. [L. strigilis (= Gr. στριγγίς), a scraper, < stringere, draw tight, contract, touch, graze, stroke; see strigil.] 1. An instrument of metal, ivory, or horn, used by the ancients for scraping the skin at the bath and in the gymnasium; a flesh-scraper. See cut under Lysippus.—2. A flesh-brush, or a glove of hair-cloth, rough toweling, or other article used for stimulating the skin by rubbing.

You are treated after the eastern manner, washing with hot and cold water, with oyles, and being rubbed with a kind of strigil of seal's skin, put on the operator's hand like a glove. Evelyn, Diary, June, 1645.

strigilate (strij'i-lāt), a. [L. strigilatus*, < strigilis, q. v.] In entom., noting the front leg of a bee when it is furnished with a strigilis.

strigilis (strij'i-lis), n.; pl. strigiles (-lēs). [NL., < L. strigilis, a scraper; see strigil.] An organ on the first tarsal joint of a bee's fore leg, used to curry or clean the antennae; a curry-comb; so called on account of the fringe of stiff hairs. At the end of the tibia is a movable spur, and on this spur an expanded membrane, the velum, which can be brought into contact with the strigilis, forming a circular orifice. The bee lays the antenna in the hollow of the strigilis, presses the velum of the spur upon it, and draws the antenna through the aperture thus formed.

strigillose (strij'i-lōs), a. [Also, erroneously, strigillose; dim. of strigose.] In bot., minutely strigose.

strigine (strij'in), a. [L. strix (strig-) + -ine.] Owl-like; related to or resembling an owl. (a) Of or pertaining to the Striges, or Strigidae in a broad sense. (b) In a narrow sense, belonging to the Strigidae (c); distinguished from Alucine.

strigment (strig'ment), n. [L. strigmentum, that which is scraped off, a scraping, < stringere, draw tight, contract, graze, stroke; see strigil.] Scraping; that which is scraped off.

Brassavolus and many other, beside the strigments and sudorous adhesions from men's hands, acknowledge that nothing proceedeth from gold in the usual decoction thereof. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 5.

Strigopidae (stri-gop'i-lē), n. pl. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1849), < Strigops + -idae.] The Strigopinae regarded as a family apart from Psittacidae.

Strigopinae (stri-gō-pi-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Strigops + -inae.] The owl-parrots; a subfamily of Psittacidae, or the only subfamily of Strigopidae, represented by the genus Strigops. Also Stringopinae. O. Finsch.

Strigops (stri'gops), n. [NL. (G. R. Gray, 1845); also Strigopsis; also Stringops and Stringopsis (Van der Hoeven, 1856); < Strix (Strig-), a screech-owl, + Gr. ὤψ, eye, face.] A genus of Psittacidae, or made type of a family Strigopidae, containing the kakapo, or nocturnal flightless parrot of New Zealand, S. habroptilus; the owl-parrots; so called from the owlish physiognomy. The sternal keel and the furculum are defective, and the birds have not the power of flight. See cut under owl-parrot.

strigose (stri'gōs), a. [NL. strigosus, < strigil, q. v.] 1. In bot., rough with strigae; beset with sharp-pointed and adpressed straight and stiff hairs or bristles; as, a strigose leaf or stem.—2. In entom., streaked, or finely fluted; having fine, close parallel ridges or points, like the surface of a file. Also strigulate.

strigosus (stri'gōs), a. [NL. strigosus; see strigose.] Same as strigose.

strike (stri:k), v.; pret. struck, pp. struck, stricken (obs. or dial. strucken), ppr. striking. [ME. striken, stryken (pret. strook, stroke, stroke, pp. stricken, stricken), < AS. strihan (pret. strāc, pp. stracen), go, proceed, advance swiftly and smoothly. = OFries. strika = D. striken = M.G. striken, L.G. striken = OHG. strihan (strong), strihan (weak), MHG. strihen, strihen, G. strihen, smooth, rub, stroke, spread, strike; cf. leol, stjaka, stryka = Sw. stryka = Dan. stryge, stroke, rub, wipe, Goth. striks, a stroke, tittle, akin to L. stringere, draw tight, graze, stroke, etc. (see stringent, strain, strict). (Cf. struck, strake, strake, stroke, etc. The senses of strike are much involved, the orig. sense 'go,' 'go along,' being commonly lost from view, or retained only as associated with the sense 'hit.' I. intrans. 1. To go; proceed; advance; in modern use, especially, to go or move suddenly, or with a sudden turn.

A mouse that moche good couthe, as me thought,
Stroke forth sternly, and stode biforn hem alle.

3. The line or cord of a bow.

The best bow that the yeman browthe
Robert set on a string.
Robin Hood and the Potter (Child's Ballads, V. 27).

4. In musical instruments, a tightly stretched cord or wire by the vibration of which tones are produced. The materials most used are gut, as in instruments of the lute and viol families, and brass or steel, as in the mandolin, the zither, and the pianoforte, though silk is also used. Silk strings are usually, and metal strings sometimes, wound with light silver wire to increase their weight; and such strings are often called silver strings. The pitch of the tone produced depends on the density, tension, and vibrating length of the string. The vibration is produced either by plucking or twanging with the finger, by a plectrum, or by a jack, as in the lute and harp families generally, and in the harpsichord; by the friction of a bow, as in the viol family; by a stream of air, as in the aeolian harp; or by the blow of a hammer, as in the dulcimer and the pianoforte. The strings are named either by the letters of the tones to which they are tuned, or by numbers. The smallest string of several representatives of the lute and viol families is often called the chanterelle, because commonly used for the principal melody or cantus. The tuning of strings is effected usually by means of tuning-pins or pegs, which in lutes and viols are placed in the head of the instrument, but in harps, zithers, and pianofortes in one side or rim of the frame. Not only has each instrument had a varying number of strings in different countries and at different periods, but the accordatura, or system of pitches, to which they are tuned has also varied. The vibrating length of the strings in instruments of the lute and viol families may be diminished, and the pitch of their tones raised, by pressing them with the fingers of the left hand against the finger-board. The exact places for such shortening or "stopping" are sometimes marked by frets, as in the guitar and also in the zither. The modern harp is provided with a mechanism for raising the pitch of certain sets of strings one or two semitones by means of pedals.

Of instruments of strings in accord
Herde I so playe a rayshing swetnesse.
Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 197.
Ye'll take a lock o' my yellow hair, . . .
Ye'll make a string to your fiddle there.

Gaudule.—Cancer stroma, the inter- lacing connective-tissue framework containing the alveoli of cancer-cells.—Intertubular stroma, the connective-tissue framework which supports the tubules of the kidney, and which contains the blood-vessels, lymphatics, nerves, etc.—Stroma fibrin, fibrin formed from the stroma of the blood-corpuscles.—Stroma of red blood-corpuscles, that part of those corpuscles which remains after the hemoglobin is removed.—Stroma of the ovary, the connective tissue of the ovary. Formerly the ova were supposed to originate in this stroma. They are, however, derived from the investing cell-layer or germ- epithelium of the ovary, from which multitudinous cells, some of them to become ova, penetrate the stroma.

Stromateidae (ström-mä-tē'i-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Stromateus + -idae.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Stromateus, related to the scombroids and earangoids.

They have large dentigerous or sacciform gill rakers on the last branchial arch, extending into the esophagus; a single long dorsal fin with a few spines in front; and the ventrals, when present, generally under the pectorals, but in the typical forms more or less reduced, or absent. They are small fishes of most warm seas, of about 6 genera and 25 species, divided into Stromateinae and Centrolophinae. Also Stromateina, as a division of Scombridae.

stromateine (ström-mä-tē'in), a. and n. [< Stromateus + -ine.] 1. a. Of, or having charac- ters of, the Stromateidae.

II. n. A fish of the family Stromateidae.

stromateoid (ström-mä-tē-oid), a. and n. [< Stromateus + -oid.] Same as stromateine.

Stromateoides (ström-mä-tē-oid-ēz), n. [NL. (Bleeker, 1857), < Stromateus + Gr. eidōs, form.]

A genus of stromateoid fishes, with restricted branchial apertures. S. sinensis is the white and S. cinereus the gray pomfret. See cut under pomfret.

Stromateus (ström-mä-tē-us), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1748), < Gr. στροματις, a coverlet, a bag for bed- clothes (in pl. patchwork), a kind of fish, < στρομα (stroma), a coverlet or spread (in allusion to the color of the typical species, sup- posed to resemble that of a spread or carpet); see stroma.] The typical genus of the fam- ily Stromateidae, in which the ventral fins are lost in the adult, the caudal peduncle is not keeled, and the gill-membranes are free from the isthmus. There are a number of species, of tropical to warm temperate seas. One of the best-known is S. triacanthus of the Atlantic coast of the United States, various- ly called butter-fish, harvest-fish, and dollar-fish. (See cut under butter-fish.) A very similar species is S. alpidotus; another is S. simillimus of the Californian coast, highly esteemed as a food-fish, known in the markets of San Fran- cisco as the pompano. See pompano, 2.

stromatic (ström-mä-t'ik), a. [< stroma (-t) + -ic.] In anat., physiol., and bot., of the nature of a stroma; resembling a stroma; stromatous.

stromatic² (ström-mä-t'ik), a. [< Gr. στροματις, a false reading for στροματις, i. e. 'patchwork,' 'miscellany,' the title of a work by Clement of Alexandria; pl. of στροματις, a coverlet; see Stromateus.] Miscellaneous; composed of dif- ferent kinds. [Rare.]

stromatiform (ström-mä-ti-förm), a. [< NL. stroma (-t), q. v., + L. forma, form.] In bot., having the form of a stroma.

Stromatopora (ström-mä-top'ō-rä), n. [NL. (De Blainville, 1830), < Gr. στρομα (-t), a covering, + πόρος, pore.] 1. The typical genus of Stromatoporidae.—2. [i. e.] A member of this genus.

Stromatoporidae (ström-mä-top'ō-rä-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Stromatopora + -idae.] A family of hydrocoralline corals, typified by the genus Stromatopora. They are all of Paleozoic age. Also Stromatoporoidea.

stromatoporoid (ström-mä-top'ō-roid), a. and n. [< Stromatopora + -oid.] 1. a. Pertaining to the Stromatoporidae, or having their characters.

II. n. A member of the Stromatoporidae.

stromatous (ström-mä-tus), a. [< stroma (-t) + -ous.] 1. Of or pertaining to stroma.—2. In bot., bearing or produ- cing a stroma.

stromb (strom), n. [< NL. Strombus.] A conch of the family Strombidae, and especially of the ge- nus Strombus; a wing-shell; a fountain-shell. The best-known stromb is S. gigas, whose delicate pink shell is used for cameo-cutting, and also ground up in the manu- facture of some fine kinds of porcelain, for which purposes it is said that 300,000 were im- ported into England in one year from the Bahamas. An- other well-known species is S. pumilus, so called from the red, as if bloody, mouth. See also cut under wing-shell.

Strombidae (strom'bi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Strombus + -idae.] A family of tanioglossate siphonostomatous pectinibranchiate gastropods, typified by the genus Strombus; the strombs or wing-shells. The animal has an elongate annulated muzzle. The eyes are highly de- veloped, at the ends of thick elongated peduncles, from which the inner sides of the tentacles, when present, originate. The foot is compressed, rather small, and adapted for leap- ing. The shell is mostly obconic, with a rather short conic spire and an elongate and narrow aperture; a horny claw-like operculum, serrated along the outer margin, is gen- erally developed. Numerous species live in tropical seas, and some of them attain a large size. The largest is Strombus gigas, the giant conch of the West Indies, much used for cameos, and also as an ornament, especially around fountains, whence it is known as the fountain-shell. The family is divided into Strombinae and Scaphylinae. See cuts under Rodellaria, scorpion shell, and stromb.

A Wing-shell or Stromb (Strombus gigas).

Strombidium (strom-bid'i-um), n. [NL. (Clap- redo and Laemann, 1859), < Strombus + Gr. dim., -idium.] A genus of peritrichous ciliate infusori- ans, of the family Halteriidae. These interesting ani- males inhabit both salt and fresh water, and, though there are no spring-hairs, they are noted for such ac- tivity and energy of movement that their examination is difficult. They are free-swimming, of globose or turbinate form, with eccentric terminal oral aperture associated with a spiral wreath of erect cirri; the endoplast and contrac- tile vacuole are conspicuous. Numerous species are de- scribed.

strombiform (strom'bi-förm), a. [< NL. strombus + L. forma, form.] Shaped like a wing- shell; having the form of a stromb; belonging or related to the Strombidae.

strombine (strom'bin), a. and n. [< Strombus + -ine.] 1. a. Of, or having characters of, the Strombidae; stromboid.

II. n. A stromboid; a gastropod of the fam- ily Strombidae.

strombite (strom'bit), n. [< stromb + -ite.] A fossil stromb, or some similar shell.

stromboid (strom'boid), a. and n. [< stromb + -oid.] 1. a. Resembling a stromb; pertaining or related to the Strombidae; strombiform.

II. n. A strombine or stromb.

strombuliform (strom'- bi-li-förm), a. [< NL. strombulus, dim. of strombus, a top (see Strombus), + L. forma, form.] 1. In geol., formed like a top.—2.

In bot., twisted or coiled into the form of a screw or helix, as the legumes of the screw- bean, some species of Medicago, etc.

Strombus (strom'bns), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1758), < L. strombus, a kind of spiral snail, < Gr. στρομβος, a top, a pine-cone, a snail, any- thing twisted or whorled, < στροβή, twist, turn; see strobile.] The typical genus of Strombidae, formerly conterminous with the family, now restricted to such species as the West Indian giant stromb, S. gigas; the wing-shells, foun- tain-shells, or strombs. They are active, predatory, and carnivorous marine shells, much used for ornamental purposes. Also called Gallus. See cut at stromb.

stromeyerine (ström'mi-ēr-in), n. [As strom- eyer (ström) + -ine.] Same as stromeyerite.

stromeyerite (ström'mi-ēr-it), n. [Named after Fr. Stromeyer, a German chemist and mineral- ogist (died 1835).] A sulphid of silver and copper occurring in crystals near chalcocite in form, also massive. It has a dark steel-gray color and metallic luster.

strommell, n. An obsolete form of strammel.

strondi, n. An obsolete form of strand.

strong¹ (ströng), a. [Se. strang; < ME. strong, stronge, strang (compar. strenger, strongere), < AS. strang, strong (compar. strengra, strængra).]

strong, mighty, = OS. strang = MD. stronge, strongh, D. strong = MLG. LG. stronge = OHG. strang, strangi, strengi, MHG. stronge, G. streng, hard, rigid, severe, strict, = Icel. strangr = Sw. sträng = Dan. stræng, strong; connections un- certain; perhaps related to string. Cf. L. stringere, draw tight (see stringent, *strain*¹, strict); Gr. σπαγγός, tightly twisted, σπαγγάλη, a halter, etc. (see strangle). No connection with *stark*¹.

Hence strength, strengthen, etc.] 1. Possess- ing, exerting, or imparting force or energy, physical or moral, in a general sense; power- ful; forcible; effective; capable; able to do or to suffer.

Therfore worschip god, bothe olde and yong,
To be in body and soule yliche stronge.

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 304.

What can be strong enough to resist those charms which neither innocence, nor wisdom, nor power are sufficient security against?

Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. iii.

Know how sublime a thing it is

To suffer and be strong.

Longfellow, Light of Stars.

When a man is able to rise above himself, only then he becomes truly strong.

J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 368.

2. Having vital force or capability; able to act effectively; endowed with physical vigor; used absolutely, physically powerful; robust; mus- cular; as, a strong body; a strong hand or arm.

And he was a moche knyght, and a stronge out of me- sure.

Melton (E. E. T. S.), ii. 164.

Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness.

Judges xiv. 14.

Of two persons who have had, the one the education of a gentleman, the other that of a common sailor, the first may be the stronger, at the same time that the other is the harder.

Bentham, Intro. to Principles of Morals, vi. 9.

3. Having means for exerting or resisting force; provided with adequate instrumentalities; powerful in resources or in constituent parts: as, a strong king or kingdom; a strong army; a strong corporation or mercantile house.

When the kynge Brangore was come to Eastrangore, his strong place, . . . he dide it stifle with knyghtes and viltale. Morley (E. E. T. S.), ii. 247.

So is it full of Dragons, of Serpentes, and of other venomous bestes that no man dar not passe, but zif it be strong Wyntre. Manderlyle, Travels, p. 296.

This is strong phisic, sionit.
And never will agree with my weak body.
Fletcher (and another), Love's Cure, iii. 2.

By mixing such powders we are not to expect strong and full white, such as is that of paper.
Newton, Opticks, l. ii. 5.

16. Intense or intensified in degree; existing in great amount or force; forcibly impressive to feeling or sensation; used of either active or passive qualities: as, strong love or devotion; a strong flavor or scent.

Is it possible . . . you should fall into so strong a liking with old sir Rowland's youngest son?
Shak., As you Like it, i. 3. 25.

Nor was her heart so small
That one strong passion should engross it all.
Crabbe, Works, IV. 83.

17. Forcefully offensive in quality; repellent to sense or sensation; ill-tasting or ill-smelling; rank; rancid; tainted.

They say poor suitors have strong breaths; they shall know we have strong arms too. Shak., Cor., i. 1. 61.

18. In com., specifically, firm; favorable to gain; steadily good or advancing; active; profitable: as, a strong market; strong prices; to do a strong business.—19. In gram., inflected—(a) as a verb, by a change of the radical vowel instead of by regular syllabic addition: opposed to weak: thus, find (found), spoke (spoke or spoke, spoken), strike (struck, stricken), and swim (swam, swum) are strong verbs; (b) as a noun or an adjective, with fuller retention of older case-distinctions: thus, German Bach is called of strong declension, and Held of weak. Strong and weak are purely fanciful terms, introduced by J. Grimm; they belong properly to Germanic words alone, but are occasionally applied to similar phenomena in other languages also.

20. In photog., same as dense, 3.—Strong arm or hand, figuratively, great power or force; forcible or violent means; overpowering vigor; the force of arms; as, to overcome opposition with a strong arm; "a strong hand," Ex vi. 1.

strong-back (strong'back), n. Naut.: (a) A piece of wood or iron over the windlass, to trice the chain up to when the windlass is to be used for any purpose. (b) A spar across boat-davits, to which the boat is secured at sea.

strongbark (strong'bark), n. A tree or shrub of the boraginaceous genus Boerhaavia, which belongs to the West Indies and tropical America. One species, B. horvathensis, which extends into Florida, is a small tree or shrub with a hard, fine, and beautiful wood of a brown color streaked with orange; the larger trees, however, are hollow and defective.

*strong-barred*¹ (strong'barrd), a. Strongly barred; tightly fastened. Shak., K. John, ii. 1. 370.

*strong-based*¹ (strong'bäsd), a. Strongly or firmly based. Shak., Tempest, v. 1. 46.

*strong-besieged*¹ (strong'bes-jejd), a. Strongly besieged. Shak., Lucree, l. 1429.

*strong-bonded*¹ (strong'bon ded), a. Strongly bound or secured; made strongly binding. Shak., Lover's Complaint, l. 279. [Rare.]

*strong-fixed*¹ (strong'fiks), a. Strongly fixed; firmly established. Shak., 1 Hen. VI., ii. 5. 102.

*stronghand*¹ (strong'hand), n. Violence; force; power; a contraction of the phrase by the strong hand. See strong arm or hand, under strong.

stronghold (strong'höld), n. A fastness; a fort; a fortified place; a place or position of security; often used figuratively, and formerly as two words.

David took the strong hold of Zion. 2 Sam. v. 7.

strong-knit (strong'nit), a. Strongly or well knit; firmly joined or compacted.

For strokes received, and many blows repaid,
Have robbed my strong-knit sinews of their strength. Shak., 3 Hen. VI., ii. 3. 4.

strongle (strong'gl), n. A strongyle. T. S. Cabbold.

strongly (strong'li), adv. [ME. strongly, strongly, strongliche, strongliche; < AS. stronglic, strong, < stronglic, strong, < strong, strong; see *strong*¹ and *hy*².] In a strong manner, in any sense of the word strong.

That Cyter [Cassay] is strongliche enhabited with peple, in so moche that in on House men maken to Housholdes. Manderlyle, Travels, p. 296.

Fly, fly—delay
Both off the strongliest founded Plots betray. J. Beaumont, Psyche, i. 44.

strongman's-weed (strong'manz-wed), n. See Petiveria.

strong-minded (strong'min ded), a. 1. Having a strong or vigorous mind.—2. Not in accordance with the female character or manners; unfeminine; applied ironically to women claiming the privileges and opportunities of men.

strong-mindedness (strong'min ded-nes), n. The character or quality of being strong-minded, especially as used of women.

*strong-tempered*¹ (strong'tem perd), a. Made strong by tempering; strongly tempered. Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 111.

strongylate (stron'ji-lät), a. [< strongyle + -ate.] Having the character of a strongyle, as a sponge-spicule; simply spicular, with blunt ends. Sollas.

strongyle (stron'jil), n. [< NL. strongylus (see Strongylus), < Gr. στρυγίλος, round, spherical, στρυγίλος, draw tight; see strangle.] 1. A spicule of the monaxon biradiate type, with each end rounded off; a strongylate sponge-spicule. It is simply a rhabdus whose two ends are blunt instead of sharp. A strongyle blunt at one end and sharp at the other becomes a strongylova. Sollas.

2. In Vermes, a nematoid or threadworm of the genus Strongylus in a broad sense; a strongylid. There are many species. See Strongylida.

Strongylia (stron'jil-iä), n. pl. [NL. < Gr. στρυγίλος, round, spherical; see strongyle.] A suborder of chilogath myriapods, with manducatory mouth, and sexual organs opening in the anterior part of the body. It includes the families Polytrichidae, Polydesmidae, Labidae, and Lysioptulidae. H. C. Wood, 1865.

strongylid (stron'jil-id), a. and n. Same as strongylid.

Strongylidae (stron'jil-i-de), n. pl. [NL. < Strongylus + -idae.] A family of endoparasitic nematoid worms, typified by the genus Strongylus, and containing about 10 other genera. They are formidable parasites, sometimes attaining a length of 3 feet, though usually much smaller than this. They are cylindrical and more or less elongated and filiform; the mouth is oval, circular, or triangular, and armed or unarmed; and the tail of the male is furnished with a bursa or pouch, or a pair of membranous lobes, and usually a pair of protruding spicules. The female is commonly larger than the male. Strongylus haematodes is the lung-strongyle of man; the female is an inch long, the male half that size. S. armatus infests the horse. S. micraurus and S. cobarrus are found in ruminants, as cattle and sheep. E. strongylus is the giant strongyle of the kidney, the largest known endoparasite of this kind, the male being about a foot long, the female a yard or more. Strongylus quadridentatus or Schrobenhaueria quadridentata infests the human intestine, and a similar strongyle, S. armatus trachialis, causes the cripes in poultry, occurring in great numbers in the air passages.

Strongylocentrotus (stron'ji-lö-sen-trö-tus), n. [NL. (Brandt), < Gr. στρυγίλος, round spherical, + κεντρος, κεντρον, point, center; see centr.] A genus of regular sea-urchins, Common New England Sea-urchin (Strongylocentrotus droba nensis).

of the family Echinidae. One of the commonest and best-known sea-urchins of the Atlantic coast of the United States is S. droba nensis.

strongyloid (stron'ji-loid), n. and n. [< strongyle + -oid.] I. a. Like a strongyle; related to the genus Strongylus; belonging to the Strongylidae.

II. n. A strongyle, or some similar nematoid.

strongyloxa (stron-ji-lok'sē-ā), n.; pl. strongyloxa (-ē). [NL., < Gr. στρογγύλος, round, + ἀξής, sharp.] A strongyle blunt at one end and sharp at the other; a strongyloxa sponge-spicule. Encyc. Brit., XXII, 417.

strongyloxa (stron-ji-lok'sē-āt), a. [As strongyloxa + -ate.] Blunt at one end and sharp at the other, as a sponge-spicule of the rhabdus type; having the character of a strongyloxa. Sollas.

Strongylus (stron'ji-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. στρογγύλος, round, spherical, + στρέω, draw tight, squeeze; see strangle.] 1. The typical genus of the family Strongylidae. Müller, 1780.—2. [L. v.; pl. strongyli (-i).] In sponges, a strongyle.

strontia (stron'shi-ā), n. [NL. (Klaproth), < strontium, q. v.] The monoxid of strontium. Strontian, an alkaline earth which when pure is an infusible grayish-white powder having an acrid burning taste. It is soluble in water with evolution of heat, slaking into a hydrate, str(OH), which is quite soluble and deposits from its solution crystals of the hydrate containing eight molecules of water of crystallization. The hydrate has a strong alkaline reaction, and is more caustic than lime, but less so than the alkalis. Strontia does not occur native, but is prepared by igniting the carbonate, the mineral strontianite.

strontian (stron'shi-an), n. and a. [< strontium + -an.] I. n. Native strontium carbonate; strontianite; hence, also, strontia, and sometimes strontium. [Indefinite and rare.]

II. a. Pertaining to or containing strontia or strontium. Strontian yellow, a color formed by adding potassium chromate to a solution of a strontium salt.

strontianiferous (stron'shi-a-nif'e-rus), a. [< strontian + -iferous.] Containing strontian. Philos. Mag., 5th ser., XXV, 238.

strontianite (stron'shi-an-īt), n. [< strontian + -ite.] Native strontium carbonate, a mineral that occurs massive, fibrous, stellated, and rarely in orthorhombic crystals resembling those of aragonite in form. It varies in color from white to yellow and pale green. It was first discovered in the lead mines of Strontian, in Argyllshire, Scotland.

strontic (stron'tik), a. [< strontia + -ic.] Same as strontianite.

strontites (stron-ti'tēz), n. [NL., < strontia (um) + -ites.] Same as strontia; so named by Dr. Hope, who first obtained this earth from strontianite, or native carbonate of strontium.

strontitic (stron-tit'ik), a. [< NL. strontites + -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from strontia or strontium.

strontium (stron'shi-nm), n. [NL., < Strontian, in Argyllshire, Scotland.] Chemical symbol, Sr; atomic weight, 87.68; specific gravity, 2.54. A dark-yellow metal, less lustrous than barium, malleable, and fusible at a red heat. When heated in air, it burns with a bright flame to the oxid. It decomposes water at ordinary temperatures, evolving hydrogen, and uniting with the oxygen of the water to form the oxid strontia. It does not occur native. The chief strontium minerals are the carbonate (strontianite) and the sulphate (celestine). Strontium also occurs as a silicate in the mineral brewsterite. It has been detected in the waters of various mineral springs, as well as in sea-water, and in the ashes of some marine plants. Salts of strontium are chiefly used in pyrotechny, imparting an intense red color to flames.

strookt (strukt). An old preterit of strike. Pope, Iliad, xxi, 498.

stroot (strūt), v. An obsolete or dialectal form of strut.

strop (strop), n. [The older and more correct form of strap; < ME. strop, stroppe, < AS. strapp (= D. strop, etc.), < L. strappus, strappus, a strap; see strap.] 1. Same as strap. Specifically—2. A strap or strip of leather, thick canvas, or other flexible material, suitably prepared for smoothing the edge of a razor drawn over it while it is attached by one end and held in the hand by the other; hence also, by extension, a two-sided or four-sided piece of wood, with a handle and a casing, having strips of leather of differing surfaces affixed to two sides, and the two other sides, when (as more commonly) present, covered with coarser and finer emery or other abrasive powder for use in honing a razor.—3. Naut., same as strap, 1 (a).—4. In rope-making, a rope with an eye at each end, used in twisting strands.

strop (strop), v. t.; pret. and pp. stropped, ppr. stropping. [< strap, n.] To sharpen on or as if on a strap or strap.

Scarce are the gray-haired sires who strop their razors on the family Bible, and doze in the chimney-corner. C. D. Warner, Backlog Studies, p. 2.

strope (ströp), n. A dialectal form of strap. strophanthin (strö-fan'thin), n. [< Strophanthus + -in.] An active poisonous principle, said to be neither an alkaloid nor a glucoside, found in the seeds of Strophanthus hispidus.

Strophanthus (strö-fan'thus), n. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1801), so called from the twisted and tailed lobes of the corolla; < Gr. στροφαός, a twisted band, a cord (< στρέω, turn, twist), + άνθος, flower.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Apocynaceae, tribe Echitidae, and subtribe Nerieae. It is characterized by a glandular calyx; a funnel-shaped corolla with five tailed lobes and an ample throat, bearing about ten scales within, and including the long taper-pointed anthers; and an ovary of two distinct carpels, ripening into divergent follicles with seeds tailed at one end and extended at the other into a long plumose beak. There are about 20 species, natives of Asia and tropical Africa, with one, S. Capensis, in South Africa. They are small trees or shrubs or often climbers, either smooth or hairy, with opposite feather-veined leaves, and terminal cymes of handsome flowers which are either white, yellowish, orange, red, or purple. The seeds of several species or varieties in Africa yield arrow-poison; in western Africa S. hispidus affords the insect poison (see pison of Pakistan, under pison), in eastern Africa S. Kombe the Kombe poison, and some species between Zanzibar and Somali-land the vanilla poison. But S. Kombe is suspected to be a variety of S. hispidus, and the third species is probably the same. Since 1878 these seeds have excited great medical interest as a medium for the treatment of heart-disease, but their investigation is not complete. (See strophanthia.) Several species are cultivated under the name twisted-flower.

strophe (strö'fē), n. [< NL. strophe, < L. strophē, < Gr. στροφή, a turning round, a recurring metrical system, the movement of a chorus while turning in one direction in the dance, the accompanying rhythmical (musical and metrical) composition; < στρέω, turn, twist.] 1. In anc. pros.: (a) A system the metrical form of which is repeated once or oftener in the course of a poem; also, a stanza in modern poetry. In a narrower sense—(b) The former of two metrical corresponding systems, as distinguished from the latter or antistrophe. (c) The fourth part of the parabasis and first part of the epirrhematic syzygy. It is hymnic in character, as opposed to the scopic tone of the epirrhema.—2. In bot., one of the spirals formed in the development of leaves. [Rare or obsolete.]—Asclepiadean strophe. See Asclepiadean.

strophic (strof'ik), a. [< Gr. στροφικός, of or pertaining to a strophe, < στροφή, a strophe; see strophe.] Of or pertaining to a strophe or strophes; constituting strophes; consisting of strophes: as, strophic composition; strophic poems.

strophical (strof'ik-al), a. [< strophic + -al.] Same as strophic. Athenæum, No. 3300, p. 123.

strophiale (strof'i-ō-lā), a. [< strophiale + -al.] In bot., bearing or furnished with a strophiale or something that resembles it.

strophiolated (strof'i-ō-lā-ted), a. [< strophiale + -ed.] Same as strophiale.

strophole (strof'i-ōl), n. [< L. stropholum, a small wreath or chaplet, dim. of strophium, < Gr. στροφή, a band, a breast-band, dim. of στρέω, turn, twist, turn.] In bot., an appendage produced from the hilum of certain seeds, of the same origin as a true aril, but less developed. Sometimes used interchangeably with aruncle, from which it clearly differs.

strophoid (strof'oid), n. [< F. strophoïde, < Gr. στροφαός, a twisted band, a cord.] 1. A nodal plane cubic curve which is the locus of a focus of a conic whose directrix and two tangents are given.—2. A curve which is the locus of intersections of two lines rotating uniformly with commensurable velocities. See also substrophoid.—Right strophoid, a strophoid symmetrical with respect to the line through the two centers of rotation.

Strophostyles (strof'ō-stī'lez), n. [NL. (Elliot, 1824), so called from the incurved style; < Gr. στροφαός, a twisted band, a cord, + στυλος, a pillar.]

A genus of leguminous plants, of the tribe Phaseoleae. It is distinguished from the related genus Phaseolus, in which it was formerly included, by capitate flowers with the keel and included style and stamens incurved but not spirally coiled, and followed by a commonly terete and straight pod with its scurfy or smooth seeds quadrate or oblong, not reniform. About 17 species have been described but some of them insufficiently, natives largely of North America, including Mexico and the West Indies, also occurring in Peru, India, and China. They are tangled vines with prostrate or climbing stems, usually retroscly hairy, bearing pinnate leaves of three leaflets, and usually long-stalked purplish clusters of a few sessile flowers. Two species, known as wild bean, both called Phaseolus helodes by various authors, extend along the Atlantic coast northward to Long Island or further, of which S. peduncularis (Phaseolus umbellatus) is a slender twiner of sandy fields, and S. angulosa (P. diversifolius) a commonly trailing plant extending west to Minnesota, and to Missouri, where on river-bottoms a high-climbing variety sometimes reaches 30 feet. Another species, S. paniculatus, occurs in the southern and western United States. See Phaseolus.

strophulus (strof'ū-lus), n. [*NL., dim. of strophulus, < Gr. στροφαός, a twisted band, a cord; see strophole.] A papular eruption upon the skin, peculiar to infants, exhibiting a variety of forms, known popularly as red-gum, white-gum, tooth-rash, etc.

strosser (stros'ēr), n. [A var. of trossers, which is a variant of trousers; see trossers.] Same as trossers.

You rode like a kern of Ireland, your French hose off, and in your strait strossers. Shak., Hen. V., iii, 7, 57.

Sets his son a-horseback in cloth-of-gold breeches, while he himself goes to the devil a foot in a pair of old strossers! Middleton, No Wit Like a Woman's, ii, 1.

stroud (stroud), n. [Also stroed; origin obscure.] A senseless or silly song. Jamieson. [Scotch.]

stroud (stroud), n. [Also stroed; origin obscure.] 1. Same as strouing.—2. A blanket made of strouing.

Be pleased to give to the son of the Piankasha king these two strouds to clothe him. Journal of Capt. Treat (1752), p. 52. (Bartlett.)

strouing (strou'ing), n. [< stroud + -ing.] Course warm cloth; a kind of blanketing used in trading with North American Indians.

Hazelnuts enough to barter at the nearest store for a few yards of blue strouing such as the Indians use. The Century, XXXIII, 33.

stroup (stroup), n. [Also stroup; < ME. stroupe, stroupe, < Sw. strupe, the throat, gullet, = Norw. strupe, the throat, gullet, an orifice, = Dan. strube, the throat, gullet; cf. feel. strjupi, the trunk of the human body with the head cut off.] 1. The trachea or windpipe. [Obsolete and prov. Eng.]

He smote him in the helm, bakward he bare his stroupe. Langtoft's Chronicle, p. 190. (Hallivell.)

2. A spout (of a tea-kettle, etc.). [Scotch.]

strout, v. An obsolete or provincial variant of strut. Bacon.

strove (ströv), v. Preterit of strove.

strow (strö), v. t.; pret. stroed, pp. stroed or strown, ppr. strowing. An archaic form of strew.

strow, a. [Cf. strow, strew.] Loose; scattered. [Rare and dubious.]

Nay, where the grass,
Too strow for fodder, and too rank for food,
Would generate more fatal maladies. Lady Alimony, D 4 b. (Nares.)

strowd (stroud), n. See stroud.

strowl, v. i. An old spelling of stroll.

strown (strön), a. A past participle of strow.

strowpet, n. See stroup.

stroyt, v. t. [ME. stroyen, by aphesis from destryen; see destry.] To destroy. Middleton.

stroyt, n. [ME. < stroy, v.] Destruction.

stroyall (strof'äl), n. [< stroy, v., + obj. all.] One who destroys or wastes recklessly; a waster.

A giddy brain master, and stroyall his knave, Bings ruling to ruin, and thrift to her grave. Tusser, Good Husbandly Lessons.

stroyer (strof'ēr), n. [< ME. stroyere, by aphesis from destryer.] A destroyer.

The drake, stroyere of his owene kynde. Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 360.

stroyl, n. See stroll.

strub (strub), v. t. and i.; pret. and pp. strubbed, ppr. strubbing. [A dial. var. of strup*, var. of strip.] To rob, or practise robbery; strip of something; as, to strub a bird's nest. [Old and prov. Eng.]

Robert Co... was convicted of "being a night-walker, and pilfering and strubbing in the night-time."

A. H. A. Hamilton, Quarter Sessions, p. 220.

struck (struk). Preterit and past participle of strike.

strucken (struk'n). An old or dialectal past participle of strike.

structural (struk'tū-ral), a. [< structure + -al.] 1. Of or pertaining to structure; constructional.

The structural differences which separate Man from the Gorilla and Chimpanzee.

Huxley, Man's Place in Nature, p. 123.

2. Concerned with structure or construction; constructive. [Rare.]

Chaucer... had a structural faculty which distinguishes him from all other English poets, his contemporaries.

Looney, Study Windows, p. 254.

3. In biol.: (a) Of or pertaining to structure; morphological; as, structural characters; structural peculiarities. (b) Possessing or characterized by structure; structured; organized. — Structural botany. See botany (a). — Structural disease, a disease involving visible (gross or microscopic) changes in the tissues affected. Also called organic and contrasted with functional disease. — Structural geology, that branch of geology which has to do with the position and arrangement of the materials composing the crust of the earth, from the point of view of their composition, mode of aggregation, and relations of position, as determined by physical conditions, without special reference to paleontological characters. Nearly the same as stratigraphical geology, or stratigraphy. Also called geotectonic geology.

structuralization (struk'tū-ral-i-zā'shon), n. [< structuralize + -ation.] A making or keeping structural; the act of bringing into or maintaining in structural form or relation. Also spelled structuralisation. [Rare.]

There is the materialisation of motives as the basis of future function, the structuralisation of simple function as the step of an advance to a higher function.

Maudsley, Body and Will, p. 20.

structurally (struk'tū-ral-i), adv. In a structural manner; with regard to structure.

structure (struk'tūr), n. [< F. structure = Sp. Pg. estructura = It. struttura, < L. structura, a fitting together, adjustment, building, erection, a building, edifice, structure, < struere, pp. structus, pile up, arrange, assemble, build. Cf. construct, instruct, destroy, etc.] 1. The act of building or constructing; a building up; edification. [Obsolete or rare.]

This doom, the sydes make up with structure,

And footes VIII it hold in latitude,

Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 176.

His son builds on, and never is content

Till the last farthing is in structure spent,

J. Dryden, Jr., tr. of Juvenal's Satires, xiv. 116.

2. That which is built or constructed; an edifice or a building of any kind; in the widest sense, any production or piece of work artificially built up, or composed of parts joined together in some definite manner; any construction.

There stands a structure of majestic frame,

Pope, R. of the L., iii. 3.

The vaulted polygonal chapter-house is a structure peculiar to England.

C. H. Moore, Gothic Architecture, p. 168.

3. An organic form; the combination of parts in any natural production; an organization of parts or elements.

A structure which has been developed through long-continued selection.

Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 131.

There can be no knowledge of function without a knowledge of some structure as performing function.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 265.

4. Mode of building, construction, or organization; arrangement of parts, elements, or constituents; form; make; use of both natural and artificial productions.

Thy House, whose stately Structure so much cost,

Congreve, Init. of Horace, II. xiv. 3.

The antistrophe structure [of Eschylus's odes] being perhaps a concession to fashion.

Quarterly Rev., CLXII. 174.

Specifically — (a) In biol., manner or mode of organization; construction and arrangement of tissues, parts, or organs as components of a whole organism; structural or organic morphology; organization; as, animal or vegetable structure; the structure of an animal or plant; the structure of the brain, of a coral, etc.

Though structure up to a certain point (in the animal organism) is requisite for growth, structure beyond that point impedes growth.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 64.

(b) In geol., various characteristic features, considered collectively, of rocks and of rock forming minerals, which features differ much in their nature and origin. Stratification, jointing, cleavage, and foliation are among the principal structural peculiarities of rock-masses, which are chiefly to be studied in the field. Some geologists would limit the term structure to petrographic phenomena of this kind, which have been designated as microscopic rock-structures. The minute structural details of rocks and their components are in part included under the name texture, and in part under that of fabrics. Thus, a rock may have a crystalline, granular, glassy, etc., texture, etc., structure, or a finely, coarsely, etc., texture. But the usages of geologists differ in the employment of terms of this kind, and there can be no precise limit drawn separating textures from structures. In general, however, the structural peculiarities of a rock are those which specially interest the geologist; the textural being more properly to the mineralogist. Microstructures, or those details of structure belonging to the constituents of rocks which are in general not to be satisfactorily studied without the aid of the microscope, are peculiarly the field of observation of the lithologist. For macro-structures, see brecia, cloud, cleavage, concretionary, fragmentary, foliation, joint, schist, slate, and slaty, and stratification; for microstructures and textures, see amphiboloid, crystalloidal, crystalline, granular, granuloblastic, granulophic and granopharic, hobocapalline, massive, microcrystalline, microblitic and microblitic, cellular, pegnatitic, pelitic, porphyritic, sericeous, spherulitic, trachytic, vesicular, extremis, and vitrophyre.

Viewed broadly, there are two leading types of structure among rocks — crystalline or massive, and fragmental.

A. Geikie, in Encyc. Brit., X. 220.

Banded, columnar, concentric, epidermal, fibrous, fluidal structure. See the adjectives. — Centric structure. See cellular structure, under cellular. — Flow-and-plunge structure. See flow. — Fluxion-structure. Same as fluidal structure. — Globulitic structure, a structure characterized by the predominance of those minute drop-like bodies called by Vogelsang globulites, which are the earliest and simplest forms of the devitrification process in a glassy component of a rock. — Granitoid structure, the structure of granite; a holocrystalline structure. — Tabular structure. See tabular.

structure (struk'tūr), v. t.; pret. and pp. structured, ppr. structuring. [< structure, n.] To form into a structure; organize the parts or elements of in structural form. [Rare.]

What degree of likeness can we find between a man and a mountain? ... the one has little internal structure, and that irregular, the other is elaborately structured internally in a definite way.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Social., § 186.

structureless (struk'tūr-less), a. [< structure + -less.] Without structure; devoid of distinct parts; unorganized; unformed; hence, lacking arrangement; informal; specifically, in biol., having no distinction of parts or organs; not histologically differentiated; not forming or formed into a tissue; homogeneous; amorphous.

structurely (struk'tūr-li), adv. [< structure + -ly.] In structure or formation; by construction. [Rare.]

These aggregates of the lowest order, each formed of physiological units united into a group that is structurely single.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 181.

structurist (struk'tūr-ist), n. [< structure + -ist.] One who makes structures; a builder. [Rare.]

struggle (strug'l), v. i.; pret. and pp. struggled, ppr. struggling. [Early mod. E. also struggell, strogell; < ME. struglen, stroglen, struglen; perhaps a weakened form of straken*, which may be a var. of struken*, the supposed ME. orig. of E. stroll, < MD. strugckelen, D. struiken = LG. strüchen = MHG. strüchen, G. straucheln, stumble; see stall.] To put forth violent effort, as in an emergency or as a result of intense excitement; act or strive strenuously against some antagonistic force or influence; be engaged in an earnest effort or conflict; labor or contend urgently, as for some object; used chiefly of persons, but also, figuratively, of things.

Every Merchant, viewing their limbs and wounds, caused other slaves to struggle with them, to try their strength.

Capl. John Smith, True Travels, 1. 29.

How nature and his honour struggle in him!

Beau. and Fl. Knight of Malta, ii. 5.

A brave man struggling in the storms of fate,

And greatly falling with a falling state!

Addison, Cato, Prolog.

So saying, he took the boy, that cried aloud

And struggled hard.

Tennyson, Dora.

The light struggled in through windows of foiled paint, but they read the word of God by it.

Emerson, Hist. Discourse at Concord.

So on and on I struggled, thro' the thick bushes and over logs.

Grace Greenwood, Recollections of Childhood, p. 28.

= Strive, etc. (see attempt); toil.

struggle (strug'l), v. t. [< struggle, v. i.] A violent effort; a strenuous or straining exertion; a strenuous endeavor to accomplish, avoid, or escape something; a contest with some opposing force; as, a struggle to get free; the struggle of death; a struggle with poverty.

With great hurry and struggle (he) endeavored to clap the cover on again.

Bacon, Physical Fables, ii.

The long and fierce struggle between the Crown and the Barons had terminated. Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist. = Syn. Endeavor, Effort, Exertion, Pains, Labor, Struggle. See strife. The above are in the order of strength.

struggler (strug'l-er), n. [< struggle + -er.] One who or that which struggles; one who strives or contends with violent effort.

struldrug (strul'drug), n. [A made name.] In Swift's "Gulliver's Travels" ("Voyage to Laputa"), one of a small class of immortals or deathless persons in "Luggnagg," born with an indicative sign in the forehead, who after four-score live on at public expense in the imbecility of extreme age.

strull (strul), v. [Origin obscure; cf. E. dial. strud, strength, agility; cf. strut, a brace.] A bar so placed as to resist weight. London.

strum (strum), v.; pret. and pp. strummed, ppr. strumming. [Prob. a var. of thrum with intensive prefix s (as in splash, plush, etc.); see thrum, drum.] 1. intrans. To play unskillfully, or in a vulgar, noisy manner, on a stringed musical instrument of the lute or harp kind, as a guitar, banjo, or zither, or (by extension) on a pianoforte; thrum.

"Ah, there is Fred beginning to strum! I must go and hinder him from jarring all your nerves," said Rosamond. ... Fred, having opened the piano, ... was parenthetically performing "Cherry Ripe!" with one hand.

George Eliot, Middlemarch, xvi.

II. trans. 1. To play upon carelessly or unskillfully, as a stringed instrument; produce by rough manipulation of musical chords. — 2. To produce a specified effect upon by strumming on a musical instrument.

To be stuck down to an old spinet to strum my father to sleep.

Sheridan, School for Scandal, ii. 1.

strum (strum), n. [< strum, v.] A strumming; a careless or discordant performance on a stringed instrument.

We heard the occasional strum of a guitar.

The Century, XXXIX. 487.

struma (strö'mä), n.; pl. strumæ (-næ). [NL. < L. struma, a scrofulous tumor, < struere, pile up, build; see structure.] 1. In pathol.: (a) Scrofula. (b) Goiter. — 2. In bot., a cushion-like swelling or dilatation of or on an organ, as that at the extremity of the petiole of many leaves, or at one side of the base of the capsule in many mosses.

strumatic (strö-mat'ik), a. [< LL. strumaticus, pertaining to struma, < L. struma, struma; see struma.] Same as strumose.

strumiferous (strö-mif'e-rus), a. [< NL. strumma, q. v., + L. ferre = E. bear.] In bot., bearing strumæ; strumose.

strumiform (strö'mi-förm), a. [< NL. struma + L. forma, form.] In bot., having the form or appearance of a struma.

strummer (strum'et), n. [< strum + -er.] One who strums; a careless or unskilful player on a stringed instrument. W. Black, House-boat, vi.

strumose, strumous (strö'mös, -mus), a. [= OF. strumosus, estrumeus, < L. strumosus, characterized by the presence of struma, or of struma. < struma, struma; see struma.] 1. Scrofulous; of, pertaining to, resembling, or affected with struma. — 2. In bot., bearing strumæ.

strumousness (strö'mus-nes), n. The state or character of being strumose or strumous.

strumpet (strum'pet), n. [< ME. strumpet, strumpet, strumpet; origin unknown; perhaps orig. strupe* or struph*, < OF. struph*, ver-nacularly struph*, < L. stuprator, fem. pp. of stuprare, debauch; cf. OF. struph, stupr, debauchery, concubinage, < L. stuprum, debauchery, > stuprare < It. stuprare, stuprare = Sp. estrupar = Sp. Pr. estrupar, debauch; cf. Gr. εστρῶν, maltreat (see stuprum, stuprator). Cf. Ir. Gael. strupach, strumpet. The E. dial. strum, strumpet, is prob. an abbr. of strumpet.]

A prostitute; a harlot; a bold, lascivious woman; also used adjectively.

Shameless strumpets, whose vncurbed swing Many poor souls unto confusion bring.

Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 88.

The scarfed bark puts from her native bay, Huzz'd and embraced by the strumpet wind.

Shak., M. of V., ii. 6. 16.

strumpet (strum'pet), v. t. [< strumpet, n.] 1. To make a strumpet of; bring to the condition of a strumpet. Shak., C. of E., ii. 2. 146. [Rare.] — 2. To call or treat as a strumpet; give an ill name to; slander scurrilously.

With his untrue reports strumpet your fame.

Massinger.

strumstrum (strum'strum), n. [Imitative reduplication of strum. Cf. tom-tom.] A rude musical instrument with strings. See the quotation.

The Strumstrum is made somewhat like a Cittern; most of those that the Indians use are made of a large Goad cut in the midst, and a thin board laid over the hollow, and which is fastened to the sides; this serves for the belly, over which the strings are placed. Danpér, Voyages, I. 127.

strumulose (strō'mū-lōs), a. [Dim. of strumosa.] In bot., furnished with a small struma.

strung (strung), v. [Origin obscure.] A bird's tail; also, the tail of any animal. Hallivell, [North. Eng.]

strunt¹ (strunt), v. i. [Prob. a nasalized form of strut.] To walk sturdily; walk with state; strut. [North. Eng. and Scotch.]

strunt² (strunt), n. [Origin obscure.] A bird's tail; also, the tail of any animal. Hallivell, [North. Eng.]

strunt³ (strunt), n. [Origin obscure.] 1. Spirituous liquor, or a drink partly consisting of such liquor.

Syne wi' a social glass o' strunt
They parted aff careerin'.

Burns, Halloween.

2. A sullen fit; a pet. Ramsay, [Scotch in both uses.]

strut¹ (strut), v.; pret. and pp. strutted, pp. strutting. [Early mod. E. or dial. also strout, strout; < ME. strouten, strouten, struten, < Dan. strutte, strut, = Sw. strutta, walk with a jolting step, = MHG. G. strotzen, swell, strut; cf. MHG. strūz, G. Strauss, a fight, contention, MHG. struzen, contend, struggle. See *strut*², n., and cf. *strut*¹.] 1. Intrans. 1. To swell; protuberate; bulge or spread out.

Curl was his heer and as the gold it shoon,
And strutted as a fanne, large and brode.

Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 129.

The mizens strutted with the gale.

Chapman, Iliad, l. 364.

The bellying canvas strutted with the gale.

Dryden.

2. To stand or walk stiffly with the tail erect and spread, as the peacock, the turkey, and various other birds. It is characteristic of the male in the breeding-season. See showing-off, 2, and cuts under peacock and turkey.

3. To walk with a pompous gait and erect head, as from pride or affected dignity.

Does he not hold up his head, . . . and strut in his gait?
Shak., M. W. of W., l. 4. 31.

Meanly to sneak out of difficulties into which they had proudly strutted.

Burke, American Taxation.

II.† trans. 1. To cause to swell; enlarge; give more importance to.

I will make a brief list of the particulars themselves in an historical truth noways strutted nor made greater by language.
Bacon, War with Spain.

2. To protrude; cause to bulge.

Or else [the lands] lifting up themselves in hills, knitting their furrowed brows, and strutting out their goggle eyes to watch their treasure, which they keep imprisoned in their stonic walls.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 829.

strut¹ (strut), n. [< ME. strut, strout, strot; see *strut*¹, v.] 1. A proud step or walk, with the head erect; affected dignity in walking.

Stynt of thy strut & fyne to flyte, & sech hys blythe ful swete & swythe.

Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), l. 353.

2. Stubbornness; obstinacy. [Prov. Eng.]-
3.† Dispute; contention; strife. Harelok, l. 1039.

strut¹, p. a. [Contr. pp. of *strut*¹, v.] Swelling out; protuberant; bulging.

He beginneth now to return with his belly strut and full.

Holland, tr. of Ammianus Marcellinus, p. 213. (Trench.)

strut² (strut), n. [Cf. Icel. strútr, a hood jutting out like a horn, = Norw. strut, a spout, nozzle, = Sw. strut, a paper cornet; cf. LG. strutt, stiff, rigid; from the root of *strut*¹; see *strut*¹, v.] A brace or support for the reception of direct thrust, pressure, or weight in construction; any piece of wood or iron, or other member of a structure, designed to support a part or parts by pressure in the direction of its length. Struts may be either upright, diagonal, or horizontal. The struts of a roof extend obliquely from a rafter to a king post or queen-post. Diagonal struts are also used between joists, in gates, etc. Also called stretching-piece. See cuts under roof, queen-post, and floor.

strut² (strut), v. t.; pret. and pp. strutted, pp. strutting. [< *strut*², n.] To brace or support by a strut or struts, in construction of any kind; hold in place or strengthen by an upright, diagonal, or transverse support.

strut-beam¹ (strut'bēm), n. A collar-beam.

struthian (strō'thi-ān), a. [< Struthio + -an.] Same as struthious.

Struthidea (strō'thid'ē-ā), n. [NL. (J. Gould, 1836), < Gr. στρουθίος, a small bird, a sparrow, + ίδος, form.] An Australian genus of jay-like birds, belonging to the family Corvidæ, having the wings short, the tail moderately long and graduated, the nostrils exposed, and the bill stout and conical. The only species is S. cinerea, 12 inches long, gray with black bill, feet, and tail, and white eyes. Also called Brachystoma and Brachyprorus.

struthiiform (strō'thi-i-fōrm), a. Same as struthioniform.

Struthio (strō'thi-ō), n. [NL. (Brisson, 1760; Linnaeus, 1766), < L. struthio, < Gr. στρουθίος, the ostrich, < στρουθός, a sparrow, < στρουθός, the big sparrow, the ostrich; see ostrich.] The only genus of Struthionidae, having but two toes, and so many other important structural characters that in some systems it is made the sole representative of an order Struthiones. S. camachus, the African ostrich, is the only established species; there are nominally two others, S. australis of South Africa, and S. molybdophanes of Somali-land. The genus formerly included some other struthious birds, as the American ostriches, now called Ikea. See cut under ostrich.

struthioid (strō'thi-oid), a. [< Gr. στρουθίος, the ostrich, + ίδος, form.] Ostrich-like; struthious to any extent; especially, struthious in the narrowest sense.

Struthiolaria (strō'thi-ō-lā-rī-ā), n. [NL. (Lamarck, 1812).] In conch., a genus of gastropods, typical of the family Struthiolariidae; so called because the lip of the shell has been compared to the foot of an ostrich.

Struthiolariidae (strō'thi-ō-lā-rī-ā-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Struthiolaria + -idae.] A family of tenebrionate gastropods, typified by the genus Struthiolaria. The animal has slender tentacles with eyes at their external bases, an oval foot, and a characteristic dentition (the central tooth being squarish, the lateral wide, five marginal teeth facet-form, and the supplementary ones very narrow). The shell is bucciform with oval subcanaliculate aperture. The living species are confined to the southern Pacific.

struthiolarioid (strō'thi-ō-lā-rī-oid), a. Of, or having characteristics of, the Struthiolariidae.

Struthiones (strō'thi-ō-nēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Struthio, q. v.] 1. The ostriches in a broad sense; the struthious or ratite birds. See Ratite, and cuts under cassowary, Dromæus, emu, ostrich, and Rhea.—2. An ordinal group restricted to the genus Struthio. A. Newton.

Struthionidae (strō'thi-on'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Struthion + -idae.] The ostrich family, variously restricted. (a) Containing the genera Struthio, Rhea, Cassarius, and Dromæus, and divided into Struthioninae and Cassariinae; same as Struthiones, 1. (b) Containing the genera Struthio and Rhea. Same as Struthioninae (a). (c) Containing only the genus Struthio, or the two African ostriches alone. The differences between these ostriches and all other birds is about as great as those usually held to characterize orders in ornithology. The digits are only two, the hallux and inner digit being aborted, leaving the third and fourth digits with the usual ratio of phalanges (4, 5), and there are corresponding modifications of the lower end of the metatarsus. The leg-bones are greatly elongated, and there is a pubic symphysis. The fore limb is reduced, with the antebrachium not half so long as the humerus; and the manus has three digits, two of which bear claws. The wings are useless for flight. There are thirty-five preacral vertebrae, and the bodies of the sacral vertebrae ankylose with the fore ends of the pubes and ischia. The sternum is doubly notched on each side behind. There are important cranial and especially palatal characters. The plumage is not afterstrated.

Struthiolaria straminea.

struthioniform (strō'thi-on'ī-fōrm), a. [Also irreg. struthiiform; < NL. struthioniformis, < L. struthion + -us, an ostrich, + forma, form.] Resembling an ostrich in the sense of being dromæognathous, as a tinamou; of or pertaining to the Struthioniformes.

Struthioniformes (strō'thi-on'ī-fōrm'ēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of struthioniformis; see struthioniform.] In ornith., in Sundevall's system of classification, a cohort of Gallinae, composed of the South American tinamous, or Cryptari, and coextensive with the Dromæognathæ of Huxley; so called from their resemblance in some respects (notably palatal structure) to struthious birds.

Struthioninae (strō'thi-ō-nī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Struthion + -inae.] The ostriches, variously restricted. (a) A subfamily of Struthionidae (a), containing the genera Struthio and Rhea, or the African and American ostriches, thus contrasted with Cassariinae, the cassowaries and emus. (b) A subfamily of Struthionidae (b); contrasted with Rheinae. (c) The only subfamily of Struthionidae (c), coterminous therewith.

struthionine (strō'thi-ō-nīn), a. [< NL. struthioninus, < L. struthion + -inus.] An ostrich; see Struthio.] Resembling or related to an ostrich more or less closely; in a narrow sense, of or pertaining to the Struthioninae; in a wide sense, struthious; ratite.

struthious (strō'thi-us), a. [< NL. Struthio + -ous.] Ostrich-like; resembling or related to the ostriches; struthiiform; ratite.

strutting (strut'ting), n. [Verbal n. of *strut*², v.] In carp., diagonal braces between joists, to prevent side deflection.

strutting-beam¹ (strut'ting-bēm), n. A collar-beam.

struttingly (strut'ting-lī), adv. In a strutting manner; with a proud step; boastingly.

strutting-piece (strut'ting-pēs), n. Same as bridging.

struvite (strō'tvit), n. [Named after Struve, a Russian statesman.] A hydrous phosphate of ammonium and magnesium, often occurring in connection with guano-deposits. It is found in orthorhombic crystals, often hemimorphic, and has a white or pale-yellow color and vitreous luster.

stry, v. t. A Middle English form of stroy.

stry (stri), v. t.; pret. and pp. stried, pp. strying. An obsolete or dialectal form of stroy.

strychnia (stri'ni-ā), n. [NL., < Strychnos, q. v.] Same as strychnine.

strychnic (stri'nik), a. [< NL. strychnia + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, obtained from, or including strychnine; as, strychnic acid.

strychnina (stri'ni-nā), n. A form of strychnit.

strychnine, strychnin (stri'ni-n), n. [< NL. Strychnos + -ine, -in.] A vegetable alkaloid (C₂₁H₂₂N₂O₆), the sole active principle of Strychnos Tieutii, the most active of the Java poisons, and one of the active principles of S. Ignatii, S. Nux-vomica, S. colubrina, etc. It is usually obtained from the seeds of S. Nux-vomica. It is colorless, inodorous, crystalline, unalterable by exposure to the air, and extremely bitter. It is little soluble, requiring 7,000 parts of water for solution. It dissolves in hot alcohol, although sparingly, if the alcohol be pure and not diluted. It forms crystallizable salts, which are intensely bitter. Strychnine and its salts, especially the latter from their solubility, are most energetic poisons. They produce tetanic spasms, but are used in medicine especially in conditions of exhaustion and certain forms of paralysis. See cut under nux-vomica.—Hall's solution of strychnine. See solution.

strychninism (stri'ni-nizm), n. [< strychnine + -ism.] The condition produced by an excessive dose of strychnine.

strychnism (stri'ni-zm), n. [< strychnia + -ism.] The hyperexcitable state of the spinal cord produced by strychnine.

strychnized (stri'ni-zd), a. Brought under the influence of strychnine.

Strychnos (stri'nos), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737), < L. strychnos, < Gr. στρυχνος or στρυχνος, a plant of the nightshade kind.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Loganiaceæ and tribe Eulogiaceæ, type of the subtribe Struchneæ. It is characterized by flowers with valvate corolla-lobes, and a usually two-celled ovary which becomes in fruit an indehiscent berry, commonly globose and pulpy with a hardened rind. About 65 species have been described, widely scattered through tropical regions. They are trees or shrubs, often vines climbing high by stiff hooked and recurved tendrils, in a few species armed with straight spines. They have opposite membranous or coriaceous three- to five-nerved leaves, and small or rather long salver-shaped flowers in terminal or axillary cymes, usually white and densely aggregated. Many species yield powerful poisons, sometimes of great medicinal value. For species stub-mortise (stub'môr'tis), n. A mortise which does not pass through the entire thickness of the timber in which it is made.

stub-nail (stub'nâl), n. An old or worn horse-shoe-nail; any short and thick nail; a stub.

stub-pen (stub'pen), n. A pen having a blunt or truncated nib, usually short and broad.

stub-short (stub'shört), n. Same as stub-shot, 1.

stub-shot (stub'shot), n. 1. In a saw-mill, the butt or unsawn part at the end of a plank, separated from the log. Also called stub-short. —2. In turning, the unworked part on a piece turned in a lathe, where it is secured to the center. It is removed when the work is finished.

stub-tenon (stub'ten'on), n. In carp., a short tenon, as at the end of an upright. E. H. Knight.

stub-twist (stub'twist), n. A material for fine shot-gun barrels, as those of fowling-pieces, wrought from stubs, and brought into form by twisting or coiling round a mandrel or by welding; also, a gun-barrel made of this material.

stubbwort (stub'wört), n. The wood-sorrel, Oralis Aetosella; so called from its growing about stubs or stumps. [Prov. Eng.]

stucco (stuk'ô), n. [Formerly also stucc, < F. stuc = Sp. estuco = Pg. estucado = D. stuc = G. Sw. stuck = Dan. stuk; < It. stucco, stucco, < OIt. stucchi, MHG. stücke, G. stück, a piece, a patch, = D. stuk = OS. stukka = AS. stycce = Icel. stykki, a piece; connected with stock.] 1. Plaster or cement, of varying degrees of fineness, used as a coating for walls, either internally or externally, and for the production of ornamental effects and figures. Stucco for decorative purposes, as the cornices and moldings of rooms and the enrichment of ceilings, usually consists of slaked lime, chalk, and pulverized white marble, tempered in water, or of calcined gypsum or plaster of Paris mixed with glue, and sometimes also gelatin or gum arabic, in a hot solution. The stucco employed for external purposes is of a coarser kind, and variously prepared, the different sorts being generally distinguished by the name of cements. Some of these take a surface and polish almost equal to those of the finest marble. The stucco used for the third coat of three-coat plaster consists of fine lime and sand. In a species called bastard stucco a small quantity of hair is used. Rough stucco is merely floated and brushed with water, but the best kind is troweled.

2. Work made of stucco. The ornamenting of cornices, etc., with garlands, festoons, fruits, and figures in stucco was carried to great elaboration by the ancient Romans, and by the Italians under Raphael's guidance in the sixteenth century.

stucco (stuk'ô), v. t. [stucco, n.] To apply stucco to; cover with stucco or fine plaster.

stuccoer (stuk'ô-ër), n. [stucco + -er.] One who stuccoes; one who applies stucco to walls, etc.; one who works or deals in stucco.

stucco-work (stuk'ô-wérk), n. Ornamental work composed of stucco.

stuck (stuk), preterit and past participle of stick 1 and stick 2.

stuck² (stuk), n. [A var. of stock 2. Cf. tuck 2.] A thrust.

stuck³ (stuk), n. and v. A dialectal variant of stock.

stuck⁴ (stuk), n. [F. stuc, < It. stucco, stucco; see stucco.] Stucco. Imp. Diet.

stuck-in (stuk'in), n. The stoccade.

I had a pass with him, rapier, scabbard, and all, and he gives me the stuck in with such a mortal motion that it is inevitable. Shak., T. N., iii. 4. 303.

stuckling (stuk'ling), n. [Origin obscure.] A thin apple pasty; a fritter. [Prov. Eng.]

stuck-up (stuk'up), a. and n. 1. a. Offensively proud or conceited; puffed up; consequential. [Colloq.]

He [the true gentleman] is never stuck-up, nor looks down upon others because they have not titles, honors, or social position equal to his own. W. Matthews, Getting on in the World, p. 144.

II. n. Same as strap-oyster. E. Ingersoll.

stud (stud), n. [Early mod. E. also studd; < ME. stude, < AS. studu, stuthu, a post, = Icel. stodh = Sw. stöd, a post, = Dan. stöd, stüb, stump, = MHG. G. stütze, a prop, support; cf. Skt. sthāna, a post. Cf. stooth, a doublet of stud. Hence ult. studdle.] 1. A post; an upright prop or support; specifically, one of the small beams or scantlings in a building, of the height of a single story, which, with the laths nailed upon them, form the walls of the different rooms. See cut under siding.

It is a gross mistake in architecture to think that every small stud bears the main stress and burden of the building, which lies indeed upon the principal timbers. J. C. Taylor (?), Artif. Handsomeness, p. 11. (Latham.)

2t. The stem, trunk, or stock of a tree or shrub. See not unlike same Hawthorne studdle, How braggy it begins to huddle, And utter his tender head? Spenser, Shep. Cal., March.

3. A transverse piece of cast-iron inserted in each link of a chain cable to prop the sides apart and strengthen it. See cut under chain.

—4. A nail, boss, knob, or protuberance affixed to a surface, especially as an ornament.

Crystal and myrrhine cups, emboss'd with gems And studs of pearl. Milton, P. R., iv. 120.

The armour of the legs consists of a chausses of chain-mail, and chausses lacing behind, which appear to be formed of studs riveted on cloth or leather. J. Hewitt, Ancient Armour, I. p. xvii.

5. A piece in the form of a boss or knob for use as a button or fastener, or in some other way. A stud for a bolt is a rounded nut to be screwed on to the projecting end. A stud for lacing is a button set in an eyelet-hole and having an ear round which the lace is passed. A shirt-stud is an ornamental button commonly with a tang or a spike by which it can be inserted in and removed from an eyelet-hole or small buttonhole in the front of the shirt.

The grate which (shut) the day out-barres. Those golden studds which nail the sturges. Dickens, London Temple (Works, IV. 122).

The stud itself, called the anvil, is connected to the sending battery, and the other pole of this battery is to earth. R. S. Culley, Pract. Telegr., p. 269.

The mantle, which falls over the back of the figure and is not gathered up at the arms, is secured by a coronal attached to two lozenge-shaped studs. Encyc. Brit., VI. 469.

Shirt-stud abscess, an abscess with a superficial and a deep cavity, connected by a short sinus.

stud (stud), v. t. pret. and pp. studded, ppr. studding. [stud, n. Cf. Icel. stydja, prop. steady.] 1. To furnish with or support by studs, or upright props.

Is it a wholesome place to live in, with its black shingles, and the green moss that shows how damp they are? its dark, low-studded rooms? Hawthorne, Seven Gables, xii.

2. To set with or as with studs.

Thy horses shall be trapp'd, Their harness studded all with gold and pearl. Shak., T. of the S., Ind., ii. 44.

3. To set with protuberant objects of any kind; scatter over with separate things rising above the surface; as, a bay studded with islands.

A fine lawn sloped away from it, studded with clumps of trees. Ireing, Sketch-Book, p. 30.

4. To lie scattered over the surface of; be spread prominently about in.

The turf around our pavilion fairly blazes with the splendor of the yellow daisies and crimson poppies that stud it. B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 22.

Studded armor, armor composed of leather, cloth in several thicknesses, or the like, through which are driven metal rivets with large heads, forming studs or bosses.

stud (stud), n. [stud, n. Cf. ME. stoud, stod, < AS. stod, a stud, = OIt. stoot, stoot, stoot, a stud, MHG. stoot, stut, a stud, a breeding mare, G. stute, a breeding mare (gestüt, a stud), = Icel. stóð = Dan. stod, a stud, = Sw. sto, a mare. Cf. Russ. studo, a herd or drove, Lith. stodas, a drove of horses. Cf. steed.] 1. A number of horses kept for any purpose, especially for breeding or sporting.

He keeps the stud (which is to be diminished) because he thinks he ought to support the turf. Greville, Memoirs, July 18, 1830.

2. The place where a stud is kept, especially for breeding; a stud-farm.

In the studs of persons of quality in Ireland, where care is taken, . . . we see horses bred of excellent shape. Sir W. Temple, Advancement of Trade in Ireland.

3. A stallion, especially one kept for service in breeding; a stud-horse. [Colloq.] —4. Dogs kept for breeding; a kennel. [U. S.] —In the stud, kept for breeding, as a horse or dog.

stud², studer, n. Middle English forms of stead.

the packing; f, f, bolts and nuts for forcing the follower against the packing.

with it, a quantity of hemp or india-rubber-packing. This packing is lubricated with oily matter, and a ring is then placed on the top of it and pressed down by screws, so as to squeeze the packing into every crevice. The stuffing-box is used in steam-engines, in pumps, on the shaft of a screw-steamer where it passes through the stern, etc.
Also called packing-box.—Lantern stuffing-box, a long stuffing-box with tightening-bolts, used in some marine engines. E. H. Knight.

Or call up the master, and break his dull noddle.

R. Jonson, Leges Convivales, v.

stum (stum), v. t.; pret. and pp. stunned, ppr. stunning. [Also stoom; < D. stommen; from the noun: see stum, n.] 1. To prevent from fermenting; operate upon (wine) in a manner to prevent after-fermentation in casks. A common method is, before filling them, to burn sulphur in the casks with the bung-holes stopped. The sulphur is coated upon a linen rag, lighted, and then dropped in through the bung-hole, which is thereupon immediately closed. The wood of the cask is thus saturated with sulphur dioxide, which destroys all the germs of fermentation contained in it, and when the wine is put in a minute portion of the sulphur dioxide is dissolved in the liquor. Sodium sulphite added to wine in small quantity produces a similar result. Salicylic acid in minute quantity also prevents after-fermentation. A few drops of oil of mustard or a little mustard-seed dropped into wine will also stum it.

When you with High-Dutch Heeren dine,

Expect false Latin and stum'd Wine

Prior, Upon a Passage in Scaligeriana.

We stum our wines to renew their spirits

Sir J. Floyer.

2. To fume with sulphur or brimstone, as a cask. [Prov. Eng.] sense.

Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

Sturdy beggar, in old Eng. law, an able-bodied beggar; one who lives by begging while capable of earning his livelihood.

Those that were Vagabonds and sturdy Beggars they were to carry to Bridewel.

Strype, Order of City of London, 1569 (quoted in Ribton-[Turner's Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 104].

= Syn. 2. Stout, Stalwart, etc. (see robust), brawny, sinewy, muscular, firm.

sturdy² (stér'di), n. [Cf. Gael. stuirdean, stuirdean, vertigo, a disease of sheep (< E.); < OF. estor-die, giddiness, < estordi, stunned, stupefied; see sturdy]. A disease of sheep caused by the presence in the brain of the cœnurus, or cystic larval form of the dog's tapeworm, Tænia cœnurus.
The cysts vary in size from that of a pea to that of a pigeon's egg. The disease is marked by lack or loss of coordination in muscular action, evinced in a disposition to stag-ger, move sidewise, or sit on the rump, and also by stupor.
Sturdy generally attacks sheep under two years old, and is rarely cured, since puncturing or trephining gives but temporary relief. Also called gid and staggers.

sture, n. A Scotch form of *stour*³.

sturgeon (stér-jon), n. [< ME. sturjon, sturgun, < AF. sturjon, OF. esturgeon, later estourgon, F. esturgeon = Sp. esturion = Pg. esturido
= It. storione, < ML. sturio (n-), sturgio (n-), <

stör = D. stuur = Sw. Dan. stør = leek. styrja =
AS. styrja, styriga, a sturgeon; prob. lit. 'a stirrer' (so called, it has been conjectured, because it stirs up mud by floundering at the bottom of the water), < OHG. stören, MHG. staren, G. stören, etc., stir; see stir]. A chondroganoid fish of the order Chondrostei and family Acipenseride (see the technical names). There are 2 leading genera, Acipenser and Scaphirhynchops, or ordinary and shovel-nosed sturgeons. Of the latter there are 4 species, confined to the fresh waters of the United States and some parts of Asia, as S. platyrhynchus of the former country, 5 feet long. (See cut under shovel-nosed.) The common sturgeon of the Atlantic, anadromous in Europe

Common Sturgeon (Acipenser sturio).

and North America, is A. sturio. Another, of the Atlantic coast of the United States, is the short-nosed sturgeon,
A. brevirostris. The small or Ruthenian sturgeon, or sterlet, of some European waters is A. ruthenus. (See sterlet, with cut.) The great white sturgeon, beluga, or huso of Pontocaspian waters, is A. huso; this is the largest known, 12 or 15 feet or more in length, weighing 1,000 pounds or more, and an important source of isinglass and of caviar. The white sturgeon of the Columbia and Sacramento rivers is A. transmontanus, an important food-fish, of from 300 to 600 pounds weight. The green sturgeon of the same waters is A. medirostris, supposed to be unfit for food. An isolated and very distinct species, land locked in fresh waters of the United States, is A.

Lake sturgeon (Acipenser rubicundus).

rubicundus, variously known as the red, black, stone-, rock-, lake-, and Ohio sturgeon; it reaches a length of 6 feet, and a weight of from 200 to 100 pounds. Nearly all the sturgeons are the objects of important fisheries, for their flesh, for various uses of their bony plated skins, and as sources of isinglass and caviar. Sturgeons rank with whales as regal or royal fishes (see regal). See also cut under Acipenser.
— Russian sturgeon, the beluga. — Spoon-billed sturgeons, the Polyodontidae. See cuts under paddle-fish, Psephurus, and Spatularia.

Sturiones (stú-ri-ó-nēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of ML. sturio, sturgeon; see sturgeon.] 1. In Cu-vier's system of classification, the first order of chondropterygians fishes; same as Chondrostei,
2. See cuts under paddle-fish, Psephurus, Spatularia, sterlet, and sturgeon. — 2. Same as Acipenseridae. Bonaparte, 1837.

sturnionian (stú-ri-ó-ni-an), a. and n. [< NL.
Sturnion + -ian.] 1. a. Pertaining to the sturgeons, or having their characters; acipenserine.

II. n. A sturgeon; an acipenserid.

sturnionian (stú-ri-ó-ni-an), n. [< Sturion + -id + -ian.] A fish of the order Chon-drostei; a sturgeon-like fish. Sir J. Richardson.

sturnionine (stú-ri-ó-nin), a. and n. [< Sturion + -in.] Same as sturnionian.

sturk, n. See stirk.

Sturmian (stér-mi-an), a. [< Sturm (see def.) +
-ian.] Of or pertaining to the French mathe-matician J. C. F. Sturm (1803-55). Sturmian function, one of the series of remainders obtained in the process of finding the greatest measure of an integral function and its derivative, provided the sign of each is changed as we proceed.

Sturnella (stér-nel'-ä), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816), < Sturnus + dim. -ella.] A remarkable genus of Icteride, typical of the subfamily Sturnelline, containing the American meadowstarlings or so-called field-larks. The bill is of peculiar shape, longer than the head, with straight outlines, abruptly angulated commissure, and flattened culmen extending on the forehead. The feet are large and strong, reaching beyond the tail when outstretched, eminently fitted for terrestrial locomotion. The wings are short and rounded, and the tail is very short, with stiffish narrow acute feathers.
The coronal feathers are bristle tipped; and the plumage is much variegated, the under parts being yellow with a black horseshoe on the breast.

Western Field Lark (Sturnella neglecta).

There is one species with several geographical races, or several species, inhabiting Mexico, Central America, and most parts of North America and the West Indies. S.
magna is the common meadow-lark of the eastern United States, and S. neglecta is characteristic of the western prairies. The genus formerly included those related South American birds in which the yellow is replaced by red, now called Trupialis or Pezetes. Also called Podiceps.
See also cut under meadow-lark.

Sturnelline (stér-ne-lin), n. pl. [NL. <
Sturnella + -ine.] A subfamily of Icteride, represented by the genera Sturnella and Tru-pialis. Coes, 1884.

sturnelline (stér-ne-lin), a. Of or pertaining to the genus Sturnella or the subfamily Sturnelline.

Sturnia (stér-ni-ä), n. [NL. (Lesson, 1847), <
L. sturnus, starling; see sturnus.] A genus of Oriental starlings. The species, of which there are few, range from eastern Siberia and Japan through China to Burma, the Philippines, Moluccas, etc. The type is S. sturnus, the kink of early French ornithologists (kink oriole of Latham, 1783), with many New Latin synonyms; its plumage is much varied with glossy blackish, greenish, and purplish, and different shades of gray, buff, isabel, and salmon-color; the bill is blue and the eyes are white;
the length is about 8 inches. This bird is chiefly Chinese, but is wide-ranging. S. sturnia (the dominican thrush of Latham, with a host of synonyms) extends from Siberia and northern China through the Malay peninsula, etc. A third species is S. vidua, with fifteen or more different Latin names and a few English ones; this is especially Japanese, but migrates in winter to the Philippines, the Mo-lucas, Borneo, and Celebes.

Sturnidae (stér-ni-dē), n. pl. [NL. < Sturnus
+ -idae.] A family of oscine passerine birds, typified by the genus Sturnus; the Old World starlings. They have ten primaries, of which the first is short or spurious; the wings are lengthened or moderate; the frontal antie extend into the nasal fossae; there are no rictal vibrissae; and the bill is attypically commaeate, with blunt, rounded, or flattened culmen, ascending gonys, and angulated commissure. The plumage is mostly of metallic or iridescent hues, sometimes splendidly lustrous or beautifully variegated, or both. The family is a large one, widely diffused in the Old World, excepting in Australia, and entirely absent from America.
Both its limits and its subdivisions vary with different writers. See cuts under Euphaga, Eulabes, Pastor, starling, and Temenuchus.

sturniform (stér-ni-fórm), a. [< L. sturnus, a starling, + forma, form.], Having the form or technical characters of the starlings; sturnoid; of or pertaining to the Sturniformes.

Sturniformes (stér-ni-fór-mēz), n. pl. [NL.:
see sturniform.] A superfamily of sturnoid passerine birds, composed of 4 families; the sturnoid Passeres.

Sturninae (stér-ni-nē), n. pl. [NL. < Sturnus + -inae.] A subfamily of Sturnidae, containing the typical starlings, represented by the genus Sturnus and related forms. In some systems the Sturninae correspond to the Sturnidae divested of certain genera referred to other families, as Euphagidae and Para-disidae, and are represented in this sense by about 28 genera and 126 species; in others the term is used in a much more restricted sense. See cut under starling.

sturnoid (stér-noid), a. [< Sturnus + -oid.] Of or pertaining to the family Sturnidae. — Sturnoid Passeres, one of four groups or series in which A. R. Wallace (Ibis, 1874, pp. 406-416) distributed the normal oscine passerine birds, the others being the typical or turdoid, the tanagroid, and the formicarioid Passeres. They are otherwise called Sturniformes, and include the starling group, a characteristic feature of which is the possession of ten primaries, of which the first is spurious. See cuts under starling, Pastor, Scisirostrum, Eulabes, Temenuchus, and Euphaga.

Sturnopastor (stér-nō-pas'tor), n. [NL. (Hodgson, 1843, as Sturnopastor).] < Sturnus + Pastor,
q. v.] A genus of starlings with bare cir-cumorbital spaces and comparatively rounded wings. There are several species, as S. contra of India, S. superciliaris of Burma, S. jalla and
S. melanoptera of Java.

Sturnus (stér-nus), n. [NL. (Brisson, 1760; Linnaeus, 1766), < L. sturnus, a starling; see *sturn*² and *sturn*².] The representative genus of Sturnidae, formerly employed with latitude, now closely restricted to such forms as the common stare or starling, S. vulgaris. The plumage is metallic and iridescent, with distinctly outlined individual feathers. The feet are short and typically oscine. The tail is about half as long as the wings, emarginate, with twelve rectrices. The wings are pointed by the second and third primaries, the first being spurious and very small. The bill is not bristled; feathers fill the intertarsal space, and extend into the nasal fossae; there is a nasal scale, and the tonial edges of the bill are dilated; the commissure is angulated, and the culmen and gonys are both nearly straight; the culmen extends on the forehead, parting well-marked antie. See cut under starling.

Stylaria (sti-lä-rä-ä), n. [NL. (Lamarck, 1816). < Gr. στήλη, a pillar, + -αρία.] A genus of annelids; same as Nais, l.

Stylaster (sti-las'ter), n. [NL. J. E. Gray, 1831). < Gr. στήλη, a pillar, + αστήρ, a star.] I. The typical genus of Stylasteridae. It was formerly considered actinozoan, and placed in the family Oculinidae; it is now known to be hydrozoan, and closely related to Millepora.

2. [l. c.] Any polyp of the family Stylasteridae. The numerous species are delicate calcareous corals, usually pink, and most nearly related to the millepores.

Stylasteridae (sti-las-ter'i-de), n. pl. [NL. < Stylaster + -idae.] A family of the order Hydrocorallacea, or coralligenous hydromedusans, typified by the genus Stylaster, related to the Milleporidae, and with the millepores forming the order. Stylasteridae differ from Milleporidae in having a calcified axial style at the base of an ampulla or dilated section of each gastrozooid, and in the more complicated cyclosystems the massive hydrosome contains tubes which possess pseudosepta formed by the regular position of the tentacular zooids; the alimentary zooids have from four to twelve tentacles. The stylasters abound in tropical seas, where they contribute to the formation of coral reefs.

stylate¹ (sti-lät), a. [*< NL. stylatus, prop. stilatus*, < L. stilus, a stake, point, style; see style¹.] In zool.: (a) Having a style or styloid; styloferous. (b) Pen-like or peg-like; styloid; styloform.

stylate² (sti-lät), a. [*< NL. stylatus, < stylus, a style (of a flower), < Gr. στήλη, a pillar; see style².] In bot., having a persistent style. Lindley.

style¹ (stil), n. [Formerly also, and prop., stile; also in def. 1, as L. stylus, prop. stilus; < OF. style, stile, F. style = Sp. Pg. estilo = It. stilo, < L. stilus, in ML. also, improp., stylus, a stake, pale, a pointed instrument used about plants, the stem or stalk of a plant, and esp. for scribbling on a waxen tablet, hence writing, manner of writing, mode of expression in writing or speech, style; perhaps earlier with long vowel, stilus, for orig. stilgus*, < √ stig in stingere = Gr. στήναι, pierce, stick, puncture (see stuck¹, stigma); otherwise akin to OHG. stil, G. stiel, a handle, etc., AS. stel, stet, E. stale, stal, a handle; see stale². The word is prop. written stile; the spelling style is in simulation of the Gr. στήλη, a pillar, which is not connected (see style²).] 1. An iron instrument, in the form of a bodkin tapering to a point at one end, used, in one of the methods of writing practised in ancient and medieval times, for scratching the letters into a waxed tablet, the other end being blunt for rubbing out writing and smoothing the tablet; figuratively, any writing-instrument.

But this my style no living man shall touch,

If first I be not forced by base reproach.

But like a sheathed sword it shall defend

My innocent life. B. Jonson, Poetaster, v. 1.

Some wrought in Silks, some writ in tender Parks;

Some the sharp Stile in waxen Tables marks.

Corley, Davids, l.

2. Something similar in form to the instrument above described, or in some respect suggestive of it. (a) A pointed or needle-like tool, implement, or attachment as the marking-point in the telegraph or phonograph, a graver, or an etching-needle. (b) In zool. and anat., a small, slender, pointed process or part: a styloid or styloform part or organ; a styloid; of sponges, a stylus. Specifically, in entom.: (1) Same as style¹, 3. (2) The bristle or seta of the antenna of a dipter. (3) A stylus. See cut under dipterus and Rhynchocera.

3. Mode of expression in writing or speaking; characteristic diction; a particular method of expressing thought by selection or collocation of words, distinct in some respect from other methods, as determined by nationality, period, literary form, individuality, etc.; in an absolute sense, appropriate or suitable diction; conformity to an approved literary standard; as, the style of Shakspeare or of Dickens; antiquated or modern style; didactic, poetic, or forensic style, a pedantic style; a nervous style; a cynical style.

Style is a constant & continual phrase or tenor of speaking and writing, extending to the whole tale or process of the poem or historic, and not properly to any particular member of a tale.

Puffenbarr, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 123.

Proper words in proper places make the true definition of a style.

Jeffreys spoke against the motion in the coarse and savage style of which he was a master.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

If thought is the gold, style is the stamp which makes it current, and says under what king it was issued.

Dr. J. Brown, Spare Hours, 3d ser., p. 277.

4. Distinctive manner of external presentation: particular mode or form (within more or less variable limits) of construction or execution in any art or employment; the specific or characteristic formation or arrangement of anything. In this sense the applications of the word style are coextensive with the whole range of productive activity. Styles in the arts are designated according to subject, treatment, origin, school, period, etc.; as, in painting, the landscape, genre, or historical style; the style of Titian or of Rubens; the Preraphaelite or the Impressionist style; in architecture, the Greek, medieval, and Renaissance styles, the Pointed or the Perpendicular style; the Louis-Quatorze or the Eastlake style of furniture; the Florentine style of wood-carving; carpets and rugs in the Persian style; styles in dress.

I don't know in what style I should dress such a figure and countenance, to make anything of them.

Encyc. Brit., XVI, 785.

5. Particular mode of action or manifestation; physical or mental procedure; manner; way; as, styles of rowing, riding, or walking; styles of acting, singing, or bowing.—6. Mode, as of living or of appearing; distinctive or characteristic manner or fashion, with reference to appearance, bearing, social relations, etc.; in absolute use, an approved or prevalent mode; superior manner; noticeable elegance; the fashion: as, to live in style; style of deportment or of dress.

There are some very homely women who have a style that amounts to something like beauty.

H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 68.

That otherwise impalpable quality which women call style.

Howell, Indian Summer, ii.

7. Hence, in general, fine appearance; dashing character; spirited appearance: as, a horse that shows style.—8. Mode of designation or address; a qualifying appellation or title; an epithet distinctive of rank, office, character, or quality.

With one voice, sir,
The citizens salute you with the style
Of King of Naples.

Fletcher, Double Marriage, v. 4.

Give unto God his due, his reverend style.

Middleton, Solomon Paraphrased, i.

9. In chron., a mode of reckoning time with regard to the Julian and Gregorian calendars. See calendar. Style is Old or New. The Old Style (abbreviated O. S.) is the reckoning of time according to the Julian calendar, the numbering of the years being that of the Christian era. In this reckoning the years have 365 days, except those whose numbers are divisible by 4, which have 366 days. The extra day is inserted in February, and is considered to be that following the 23d of that month. For ecclesiastical reasons, the calendar was reformed by Pope Gregory XIII., by adding 10 days to the date after October 4th, 1582, and thereafter making no years whose numbers end with two ciphers leap-years except those whose significant figures are divisible by 4. The year in New Style always begins with January 1st, but in Old Style there was some diversity of practice. The Gregorian year accords closely with the tropical year; but otherwise its advantages are merely ecclesiastical and theoretical. This mode of correcting the calendar has been adopted at different times by almost all civilized nations except Russia and other countries where the Greek Church is predominant, which still adhere to the Old Style. In England the Gregorian or New Style (abbreviated N. S.) was adopted by act of Parliament in 1751, and as one of the years concluding a century in which the additional or intercalary day was to be omitted (the year 1700 had elapsed since the correction by Pope Gregory, it was necessary to omit 11 instead of 10 days in the current year). Accordingly, 11 days in September, 1752, were re-trenched, and the 3d day was reckoned the 14th. The difference between the Old and New Styles is now 12 days.—Attic style. See Attic.—Concertante, Corinthian, crystalline, cushion, discharge style. See the qualifying words.—Early English style, a modern factitious style of furniture and decoration, in which some elements of the decoration of the middle ages were used mingled with others. It was characterized by a free use of black and gold, and by designs in color in hard flat patterns of one color relieved upon another.—Florid style of medieval architecture. See florid.—Garancin style. Same as mudler style.—Geometric style. See geometric.—Jesuit style, in arch. See baroque.—Juridical styles, in Scots law, the particular forms of expression and arrangement necessary to be observed in formal deeds and instruments.—Lacrymal style, a short wire worn in a lacrymal duct in treatment of obstruction of this duct.—Lapidary, madder, monodic, ocellular style. See the qualifying words.—Palestrina style, in music, the style of church music. Compare a cappella.—Perpendicular style. See perpendicular.—Queen Anne style. See queen.—Rainbow, Renaissance, resist, etc., style. See the qualifying words.—Style of a court, the practice observed by any court in its way of proceeding.—Syn. 3. Diction, Phrasology, etc. (See diction.) Invention, Style, Amplification, in rhetoric. See invention. 8. Appellation, etc. See name.

*style*¹ (stīl), v. t.; pret. and pp. styled, pp. styling. [Formerly also, and prop., stile; < *style*¹, n.] 1. To record with or as with a style; give literary form to; write.

Poetry is nothing else but Feigned History, which may be styled as well in prose as in verse.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

2. To give or accord the style or designation of; entitle; denominate; call.

He is also stiled the God of the rural inhabitants.

R. Eden, tr. of Gemma Phrysius (First Books on America, [ed. Arber, p. 389]).

3. In bot., a narrowed extension of the ovary, which, when present, supports the stigma. It is usually slender, and in that case of varying length, often elongated, as in honeysuckle, fuchsia, and in an extreme case Indian corn (forming its "silk"); sometimes it is thick and short, as in squash, grape-vine, etc.; sometimes wholly wanting, leaving the stigma sessile. Morphologically it is the attenuated tip of the carpel, hence equalling the carpels in number, except when, as in many compound pistils, the styles are consolidated. It is said to be simple when undivided, even if formed by the union of several. When cleft or slit it is bith, trith, etc.; when more deeply separated it is bipartite, tripartite, etc. According to the conformation of the carpel, the style may be terminal, rising from its summit, as is typically the case, or lateral, as in strawberry and cinquefoil, or basal, as in comfrey and salvia—the carpel being in these last cases more or less bent over. In position it may be erect, ascending, declinate, recurved, etc.; in form it may be filiform, subulate, trigonal, claviform, petaloid, etc. In relation to the corolla or calyx it may be included or exerted. A style may be persistent, but is commonly caducous, falling soon after fecundation. The function of the style is to present the stigma in a position advantageously to receive the pollen, and to form a medium for its communication to the ovules; accordingly, it has the structure of a tube filled or lined with a conductive tissue of the same nature as that which composes the stigma. See pistil, ovary, pollen-tube, and stigma.

*style*³, n. An obsolete spelling of *stil*¹.
style-branch (stīl'branch), n. In bot., a branch or division of the style. In the Compositae the character of the style-branch is of important systematic value.
style-curve (stīl'kērv), n. A curve constructed to exhibit the peculiarities of style or composition of an author. It may be drawn so that the abscissae represent the number of letters in a word, while the corresponding ordinates show the relative frequency of the occurrence of such words, or other characteristics may be selected. Experiments seem to prove that, when a sufficiently extensive analysis is made in this manner, every writer will be found to be represented by a curve peculiar to himself. Science, XIII, 92.

*style*⁴ (stī'let), n. [OF. stylet, < It. stiletto, a pointed instrument, dagger, dim. of stilo, a pointed instrument: see *style*¹, and cf. stiletto.] 1. A slender pointed instrument; a stiletto.

"Come, Paul!" she reiterated, her eye grazing me with its hard ray like a steel style.

Charlotte Brontë, Villette, vi.

2. In surg., the perforator of a trocar; the stiffening wire or rod in a flexible catheter; sometimes, a probe. Also stilette.—3. In zool., a little style; also, a style; specifically, in entom., one of the second of the three pairs of rhabdites or appendages of the abdominal sternites entering into the formation of the ovipositor. See cut under Aretisca.

styletiform (stī'let-i-fōrm), a. [< stylet + L. forma, form.] Shaped like a stylet; styloid.
stylewort (stīl'wōrt), n. A plant of the genus Candollea, formerly Stylidium; more broadly (Lindley), a plant of the order Candolleaceae, formerly Stylidaceae (Stylidiaceae).

Stylidiaceae (stī-lī-dī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Jussieu, 1811), < Stylidium + -aceae.] An order of gamopetalous plants, of the cohort Campanales, now known as Candolleaceae. It is characterized by flowers usually with an irregular calyx and corolla each with five lobes, two stamens united into a column with the style, and a two-celled ovary with numerous ovules. The order is closely related in habit to the Lubelia, which, however, are readily distinguished by the free style. It contains about 105 species, belonging to 5 genera, of which Stylidium is the type, mostly Australian herbs, a few in tropical Asia, New Zealand, and antarctic America. They are herbs or rarely somewhat shrubby plants with radical scattered or seemingly whorled leaves, which are entire and usually narrow or small. Their flowers form terminal racemes or panicles, usually primarily centripetal in development and secondarily centrifugal. Also Stylidiaceae.

Stylidium (stī-līd'i-um), n. [NL. (Swartz, 1807), so named from the stamen-column; < Gr. στύλος, a pillar, column, + dim. -ιδιον.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, now known as Candollea (Labillardière, 1805), type of the order formerly called Stylidiaceae, and now known as Candolleaceae. It is characterized by flowers with the fifth lobe of the irregular corolla very different from the others, forming a smaller or narrow curving lip, and by the long recurved or replicate and usually elastic stamen-column. The 7 species are all Australian but 3, which are natives of Asia, principally of India. Many species are cultivated under glass, under the name of stylewort, for their rose-colored flowers; see also hairtrigger-flower. The name Stylidium (Lourieau, 1790), no longer used for Candollea, is at present applied instead to a small tropical genus of coriaceous trees and shrubs, formerly Marlea (Roxburgh, 1819), sometimes cultivated under glass for its yellow flowers.

Stylidium (Candollea) laricifolium. a, a flower; b, longitudinal section of flower; c, transverse section of fruit.

The name Stylidium (Lourieau, 1790), no longer used for Candollea, is at present applied instead to a small tropical genus of coriaceous trees and shrubs, formerly Marlea (Roxburgh, 1819), sometimes cultivated under glass for its yellow flowers.

styliform (stī'lī-fōrm), a. [< L. stylus, prop. stilus, a pointed instrument, + forma, form, shape; see form.] Having the shape of a style; resembling a pen, pin, or peg; styloid.

*style*¹ (stī'lin), a. [< *style*² + *-ine*¹.] In bot., of or pertaining to the style.

styliscus (stī-lis'kus), n.; pl. stylisci (-ī). [NL. (Lindley), < Gr. στύλικος, dim. of στύλος, a pillar, a shaft: see *style*².] In bot., the channel which passes from the stigma of a plant through the style into the ovary.

stylish (stī'lish), a. [< *style*¹ + *-ish*¹.] Having style in aspect or quality; conformable or conforming to approved style or taste; strikingly elegant; fashionable; showy; as, stylish dress or manners; a stylish woman; a stylish house.

stylishly (stī'lish-li), adv. In a stylish manner; fashionably; showily.

stylishness (stī'lish-nes), n. The state or property of being stylish, fashionable, or showy; showiness: as, stylishness of dress or of an equipage. Jane Austen, Northanger Abbey, viii.

stylist (stī'list), n. [< *style*¹ + -ist.] A writer or speaker distinguished for excellence or individuality of style; one who cultivates, or is a master or critic of, literary style.

Exquisite style, without the frigidity and the over-correctness which the more deliberate stylists frequently display.

G. Saintsbury, Hist. Elizabethan Literature, x.

stylistic (stī-lis'tik), a. and n. [< stylist + -ic.] 1. a. Of or relating to style.

Nor has accuracy been sacrificed to stylistic requirements.

Athenaeum, No. 3044, p. 292.

II. n. 1. The art of forming a good style in writing. Also used in the plural.—2. A treatise on style. [Rare.]

stylistically (stī-lis'ti-kal-i), adv. In a stylistic relation; with respect to style. Classical Rev., III, 87.

stylete (stī'lit), n. [L. Gr. στυλῆτις, of or pertaining to a pillar, a pillar-saint, < στυλος, a pillar: see *style*².] In ecclcs. hist., one of a class of solitary ascetics who passed the greater part of their lives unsheltered on the top of high columns or pillars. This mode of mortification was practised among the monks of the East from the fifth to the eleventh century. The most celebrated was St. Simeon the stylete, who lived in the fifth century. Also called pillar-saint.

stylobate (stī'lō-bāt), n. [= F. stylobate, < Gr. στυλοβάτης, the base of a pillar, < στυλος, a pillar, + βαίνω, go, advance.] In arch., a continuous basement upon which columns are placed to raise them above the level of the ground or a floor; particularly, the uppermost step of the stylobate of a columnar building, upon which rests an entire range of columns. It is distinguished from a pedestal, which, when it occurs in this use, supports only a single column. See cuts under base and stylobate.

stylocerite (stī-lōs'e-rīt), n. [L. stylus, prop. stilus, a pointed instrument (see *style*¹), + Gr. κέρας, horn, + -itis.] A style or spine on the outer side of the first joint of the antennule of some crustaceans. C. Spence Bate.

styloglossal (stī-lō-glos'sal), a. and n. [Styloglossus + -al.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the styloid process and the tongue.

II. n. The styloglossus.

styloglossus (stī-lō-glos'sus), n.; pl. styloglossi (-ī). [N.L., < E. stylo(id) + Gr. γλῶσσα, tongue.] A slender muscle arising from the styloid process and inserted into the side of the tongue.

stylogonidium (stī-lō-gō-nid'i-um), n.; pl. stylogonidia (-ī). [L. stylus, prop. stilus, a pointed instrument (see *style*¹), + N.L. gonidium, q. v.] In bot., a gonidium formed by abstriction on the ends of special filaments. Phillips, Brit. Discomycetes.

stylograph (stī-lō-grāf), n. [L. stylus, prop. stilus, a style (see *style*¹), + Gr. γράφω, write.] A stylographic pen. Elect. Rev. (Eng.), XXVI, 68.

stylographic (stī-lō-grāf'ik), a. [As stylography + -ic.] Of or pertaining to stylography or a stylograph; characterized by or adapted to the use of a style: as, stylographic cards; a stylographic pencil; stylographic ink.—Stylographic pen. See *pen*².

stylographical (stī-lō-grāf'i-kal), a. [Stylographic + -al.] Same as stylographic.

stylographically (stī-lō-grāf'i-kal-i), adv. In a stylographic manner; by means of a style for writing or engraving.

stylography (stī-lō-grā'f-i), n. [L. stylus, prop. stilus, a style (see *style*¹), + Gr. γραφία, γράφω, write.] The art of tracing or the act of writing with a style; specifically, a method of drawing and engraving with a stylo on cards or tablets.

stylohyal (stī-lō-hī'al), n. [Stylo(id) + hy(oid) + -al.] In zool. and anat., one of the bones of the hyoidean arch, near the proximal extremity of that arch, being or representing an infrastapedial element. In some vertebrates below mammals it is a part or division of the columellar stapes; in mammals it is the first bone of the hyoidean arch outside of the ear; in man it is normally ankylosed with the temporal bone, constituting the styloid process of that bone, and is connected only by a ligament (the stylohyoid ligament: see epithyoid) with the lesser cornua of the hyoid. See stylohyoid, and cuts under Petromyzon, skull, and hyoid.

stylohyoid (stī-lō-hī'oid), a. and n. [Stylo(id) + hyoid.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the stylohyal, or styloid process of the temporal bone, and the hyoid bone.—Stylohyoid ligament. See epithyoid and ligament, and cut under skull.—Stylohyoid muscle. A slender muscle extending from the styloid process of the temporal bone to the hyoid bone; the stylohyoids. See II.—Stylohyoid nerve. That branch of the facial nerve which goes to the stylohyoid muscle.

II. n. The stylohyoid muscle. See cuts under skull and *muscle*¹.

stylohyoidean (stī-lō-hī-oi'dē-an), a. [Stylohyoid + -ean.] Same as stylohyoid.

stylohyoideus (stī-lō-hī-oi'dē-us), n.; pl. stylohyoidei (-ī). [N.L.: see stylohyoid.] The stylohyoid muscle. See stylohyoid, n.

styloid (stī'loid), a. [L. stylus, prop. stilus, a style (see *style*¹), + Gr. ειδός, form.] Having some resemblance to a style or pen; like or likened to a style; styliform or stylate: an anatomical term applied to several processes of bone, generally slenderer than those called spines or spinuous processes.—Styloid cornua. The epiphyseal; the lesser cornua of the hyoid bone: so called because of their attachment to the stylohyoid ligament.—Styloid process. See process and cuts under skull and forearm.

styolite (stī'lō-līt), n. [Gr. στυλος, a pillar (see *style*²), + λίθος, stone.] A peculiar form of jointed or columnar structure occasionally seen in beds of limestone, uniting the adjoining surfaces of two layers of the rock, and usually from half an inch to 3 or 4 inches in length. Styolites were at first considered to be fossil corals, and called ligulites, and later epimites, it being supposed that they had been formed by the crystallization of sulphate of magnesia. Styolite is the name now most generally adopted for them, and it is believed that they are due to pressure of the superincumbent rock, which the styolite has been able to resist to a certain extent because protected by a shell, or some other organic body, which would not admit of the sinking of the material immediately under it as rapidly as did the adjacent rock under the compression of the overlying material, the part thus protected forming a columnar individual mass with slightly striated surface.

stylostoid (stī-lō-mas'toid), a. [Stylo(id) + stoid.] In anat., common to the styloid process and the mastoid division of the temporal bone.—Stylostoid artery. A branch of the posterior auricular artery, which enters the stylostoid foramen to supply parts of the inner ear.—Stylostoid foramen. See foramen, and cuts under Felidae and skull.—Stylostoid vein. A small vein emptying into the posterior auricular vein.

stylostomaxillary (stī-lō-mak'si-lā-rī), a. [Stylo(id) + maxillary.] Of or pertaining to the styloid process of the temporal bone and the inframaxillary, or lower jaw-bone.—Stylostomaxillary ligament. A thin band of ligamentous fibers passing from near the tip of the styloid process to the angle and posterior border of the ramus of the mandible.

stylostometer (stī-lōm'e-tēr), n. [Gr. στυλος, pillar, column, + μέτρον, measure.] An instrument for measuring columns.

Stylostomatophora (stī-lō-ma-tof'ō-rā), n. pl. [N.L., nont. pl. of stylostomatophorus: see stylostomatophorus.] A suborder or other prime division of pulmonate gastropods, having the eyes borne on the ends of the tentacles: opposed to Basomatophora. It includes the terrestrial pulmonates, as land-snails and slugs. Geophila and Nephropneusta are synonyms.

stylostomatophorous (stī-lō-ma-tof'ō-rus), a. [N.L. stylostomatophorus, < Gr. στυλος, a pillar, + ὄμμα(-), an eye, + -όρος, < φέρω = E. bear.] Having eyes at the top of a style, horn, or tentacle, as a snail; of or pertaining to the Stylostomatophora.

stylostomatous (stī-lōm'a-tus), a. [Gr. στυλος, a pillar, + ὄμμα(-), an eye.] Same as stylostomatophorous.

stylopharyngeal (stī-lō-fā-rin'jē-al), a. and n. [Stylopharyngeus + -al.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the styloid process and the pharynx.

II. n. The stylopharyngeus.

stylopharyngeus (stī-lō-fā-rin'jē-us), n.; pl. stylopharyngei (-ī). [N.L., < L. stylus, prop. stilus, a style, + Gr. φάρυγξ (φάρυγξ), the throat.] A long slender muscle, spreading out below, arising from the base of the styloid process of the temporal bone, and inserted partly into the constrictor muscles of the pharynx, and partly into the posterior border of the thyroid cartilage: it is innervated by the glossopharyngeus.

Stylophorum (stī-lōf'ō-rum), n. [N.L. (Nuttall, 1818), so called from the conspicuous style; < Gr. στυλος, a pillar (see *style*²), + φέρω = E. bear.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Papaveraceae and tribe Papaveraceae. It is characterized by flowers with two sepals, four petals, and a distinct style which bears from two to four erect lobes, and is persistent with the placenta after the fall of the valves and serotinate seeds from the ovoid, oblong, or linear, and commonly stalked capsule. There are 4 or 5 species, 2 in North America, the others in the Himalayas, Manchuria, and Japan. They are herbs with a perennial rootstock and a yellow juice, bearing a few lobed or dissected tender stem-leaves, and usually others which are pinnatifid and radical. The yellow or red flowers are borne on long peduncles which are nodding in the bud. S. diphyllum is thecelandine poppy or yellow poppy of the central United States, formerly classed under Mecumopsis. Its light-green leaves resemble those of thecelandine, and, like it, contain a yellow juice.

Stylopidæ (stī-lōp'i-dē), n. pl. [N.L. (Kirby, 1813), < Stylo + -idæ.] An aberrant group of insects, formerly considered as forming a distinct order, Strepsiptera or Rhipiptera, but now ranked as a family of heteromorphous beetles, typified by the anomalous genus Stylops. In the males, which are capable of flight, the mouth-parts are atrophied, except the mandibles and one pair of palpi; the prothorax and mesothorax are very short; the elytra are reduced to simple club-shaped appendages (psuedoelytra), while the hind wings are well developed, the metathorax being remarkably large and long, and the abdomen small. The females are wingless and worm-like, with a flattened triangular head, and live in the abdomen of certain bees and wasps, though the members of some exotic genera parasitize ants and some homopterous and orthopterous insects. They are viviparous, giving birth to hundreds of minute young, of very primitive form, with bulbous feet, slender hairy body ending in two long styles, and intestine ending as a closed sac. Stylops and Xenus are the only genera represented in North America. S.

Stylopidæ.—Styl. p. terreus, Kirby.

children lives in certain bees, and X. p. cili in a common wasp (Polistes metricus). See cut under Stylops.

styloped (stī'lō-pēd), n. [Gr. στυλος, a pillar (see *style*²), + πῶς (πῶς) = E. foot.] In bot., same as stylopodium.

stylopodium (stī-lō-pō'di-um), n.; pl. stylopodia (-ā). [N.L.: see stylopod.] In bot., one of the double fleshy disks from which the styles in the Umbelliferae arise.

Stylops (stī'lōps), n. [N.L. (Kirby, 1802), < Gr. στυλος, a pillar (see *style*²), + ὄμα, eye, face.] 1. A genus of insects, type of the order Rhipiptera.

1. Stylops terreus, adult female, with two nearly hatched eggs. C, D, in B. the abdomen; A. ventral surface of thorax of three segments 1, 2, 3; a. mandibles; b. mouth. 2. Stylops terreus, newly born larva, on a hair of a bee (Andrena trimemora). (All highly magnified.)

tera or Strepsiptera, and now of the coleopterous family Stylopidae.—2. [l. c.] An insect of this genus: a rhipipter or strepsipter.

Stylosanthes (stī-lō-san'thēz), n. [N.L. (Swartz, 1788), so called from the stalk-like calyx-tube; irreg. < Gr. στυλος, a pillar (see *style*²), + ἄνθος, flower.] A genus of leguminous plants, of the tribe Hedysarea, type of the subtribe Stylosanthes. It is characterized by pinnate leaves of three leaflets, and an oblong or globose and usually densely flowered spike, a long stalk-like calyx-tube, and stamens united into a closed tube with their anthers alternately oblong and basifixed and shorter and versatile. There are about 21 species, of which 4 are natives of Africa or Asia, 1 is North American, and the others are South American and mainly Brazilian. They are commonly viscous herbs with yellow flowers in dense terminal spikes or heads, rarely scattered or axillary. S. elatior of the United States, the pencil-flower of southern pine-barrens, extends north to Long Island and Indiana. S. procumbens is known in the West Indies as trefoil.

stylospore (stī'lō-spōr), n. [Gr. στυλος, a pillar (see *style*²), + σπόρα, seed: see spore.] In bot., a stalked spore, developed by abstriction from the top of a slender thread or stroma, and produced either in a special receptacle, as a pyrenidium, or uninclosed as in the Coniomyces. See pyrenidium, microstylospore. Also called pyrenidiospore, pyrenogonidium, pyrenospore.

stylosporous (stī-lōs'pō-rus), a. [Stylospore + -ous.] In bot., of the nature of a stylospore; resembling a stylospore.

stylostegium (stī-lō-stē'jū-m), n.; pl. stylostegia (-ā). [N.L., < Gr. στυλος, a pillar (see *style*²), + στεγος, cover.] In bot., the peculiar orbicular corona which covers the style in Stapelia and similar asclepiads.

stylostemon (stī-lō-stē'mon), n. [N.L., < Gr. στυλος, a pillar, + στέμον, taken as 'stamen' (see *stamen*¹).] In bot., an epigynous stamen.

stylostypite (stī-lō-tī-pīt), n. [Gr. στυλος, a pillar (see *style*²), + τύπος, impression, + -itis.] A sulphid of antimony, copper, iron, and silver, from Copiapo, Chili: it is closely related to homonitrite.

stylus (stī'lus), n.; pl. styli (-lī). [NL., < L. stylus, prop. stilus, a pointed instrument: see style.] 1. A sponge-spicule of the monaxon unirate type, sharp at one end and not at the other. It is regarded as an oxea one of whose rays is suppressed.—2. In entom., a style or stylet.

styme, n. See stime.

stymie (stī'mī), n. [Origin obscure; perhaps connected with styme, stime, a glimpse, a transitory glance.] In golf-playing, a position in which a player has to putt for the hole with his opponent's ball directly in the line of his approach.

Stymphalian (stim-fā'li-an), a. [L. Stymphalius, < Gr. Στυμφαλίος, < Στυμφαλίς, Stymphalus (see def.).] Of or pertaining to Stymphalus (the ancient name of a small deep valley, a lake, a river, and a town in Arcadia, Greece).—Stymphalian birds, in Gr. fable, a flock of noisome, voracious, and destructive birds, with brazen or iron claws, wings, and beaks, which infested Stymphalus. The killing or expulsion of these birds was the sixth labor of Hercules.

A sort of dangerous fowl [crities], who have a perverse inclination to plunder the best branches of the tree of knowledge, like those Stymphalian birds that eat up the fruit. Swift, Tale of a Tub, iii.

styptic (stip'tik), a. and n. [Formerly also stiptic, stiptik; < ME. stiptik, < OF. (and F.) stiptique = Sp. estiptico = Pg. estitico = It. stictico, < L. stypicus, < Gr. στυπτικός, astringent, < στυπνέω, contract, draw together, be astringent.] I. a. 1. Astringent; constrictive; binding.

Take heed that slippery meats be not fyrste eaten, nor that stiptik nor restraining meates be taken at the beginning, as quynces, pears, and medlars. Sir T. Elyot, Castle of Health, fol. 45.

2. Having the quality of checking hemorrhage or bleeding; stanching.

Then in his hands a bitter root he bruise'd;

The wound he wash'd, the styptic juice infus'd.

Pope, Iliad, xi. 983.

Styptic collodion, a compound of collodion 100 parts, carbolic acid 10 parts, pure tannin 5 parts, and benzoic acid 3 parts. Also called styptic collod.—Styptic powder. See powder.

II. n. 1. An astringent; something causing constriction or constraint.

Mankind is infinitely beholden to this noble styptic, that could produce such wonderful effects so suddenly. Steele, Lying Lover, v. 1.

2. A substance employed to check a flow of blood by application to the bleeding orifice or surface.

Of wombe or of stomack this wol declyne.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 102.

Cotton-wool styptic, cotton-wool soaked in tincture of perchlorid of iron.

styptical (stip'ti-kāl), a. [< styptic + -al.] Same as styptic.

styptic-bur (stip'tik-bēr), n. See Priva.

stypticite (stip'ti-sit), n. [< styptic + -ite.] Same as fibroferite.

stypticity (stip-tis'i-ti), n. [< styptic + -ity.] The property of being styptic; astringency.

Cathartics of mercurials precipitate the viscidities by their stypticity, and mix with all animal acids. Sir J. Floyer.

styptic-weed (stip'tik-wēd), n. The western cassia, Cassia occidentalis, a tall herb of tropical America and the southern United States. Its seeds from their use, are called negro or Majadad coffee, though they do not contain caffeine; its root is said to be diuretic; and its leaves are used as a dressing for slight wounds (whence the name). Also stinking-weed, stinking-wood.

Styracaceæ (stī-rā-kā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Alphonse de Candolle, 1844). < Styrax (-ac-) + -aceæ.] Same as Styracææ.

Styracææ (stī-rā-sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Richard, 1808), for Styracaceæ; < Styrax + -aceæ.] An order of gamopetalous plants, of the cohort Ebenales. It is characterized by flowers which usually have ten or more stamens attached to a five-lobed corolla, and an ovary which is inferior, half inferior, or fixed by a broad base, and contains a solitary ovule or few in each cell. The embryo, with its doubtful radicle, also differs from that of the allied orders, the Sapotaceæ and Ebenaceæ, in which it is respectively inferior and superior. The order includes about 235 species, belonging to 7 genera, of which one is Halesia of North America and Asia, 4 are small South American genera, and the others belong to the large genus Styracis or to the type Styrax, natives of warm regions, but wanting in Africa. They are smooth, hairy, or scurfy trees or shrubs, with alternate entire or serrate membranous or coriaceous feather-veined leaves. Their flowers are usually white and racemed, rarely reddish, and sometimes cymose or fasciated. See Halesia, Styrax, and storax.

styracin, styracine (stīr'a-sin), n. [< NL. Styrax (-ac-) + -in, -ine.] An ester (C₁₈H₁₆O₂) of cinnamic acid, which is the chief constituent of storax. It forms odorless and tasteless crystals, which have the properties of a resin.

Styrax (stī'raks), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), so named because producing a gum; < L. styrax, storax, < Gr. στευξ, the gum storax, also the tree producing it; see storax.] A genus of dicotyledonous plants, type of the order Styracææ. It is characterized by flowers with five partly united or separate petals, ten stamens in one row with linear or rarely oblong anthers, and a three-celled or afterword one-celled ovary with the ovules usually few and erect or pendulous. The fruit is seated upon the calyx and is globose or oblong, dry or drupeous, indehiscent or three-valved, and nearly filled by the usually solitary seed. There are over 60 species, widely scattered through warm regions of Asia and America, a few also natives of temperate parts of Asia and southern Europe, but none found in Africa or Australia. They are shrubs or trees, usually scurfy or covered with stellate hairs, and bearing entire or slightly serrate leaves, and usually white flowers in pendulous racemes. Several species are cultivated for ornament; S. japonica, recently introduced into gardens, is known from its feathery white blossoms as snowflake - flower. Others yield valuable gums, especially S. benzoin (see benzoin) and S. officinalis (see storax). S. punctata, a Central American tree, yields a gum which is used as frankincense, and is obtained on removing the external wood from trees which have been cut for several years. S. grandifolia, S. Americana, and S. polycarpa, known as American storax, occur in the United States from Virginia southward, with one species in Texas and one in California.

Styrax Benzoin. a, a flower.

Styrian (stī'rī-an), a. and n. [< Styria (see def.) + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Styria, a crownland and duchy of the Austrian empire, lying south of Upper and Lower Austria, and west of Hungary.

II. n. One of the people of Styria.

styrol (stī'rol), n. [< L. styr(ax) + -ol.] A colorless strongly refractive liquid (C₈H₈), with an odor like that of benzol, obtained by heating styracine with calcium hydrate. Also called cinnamene.

styrolene (stī'rō-lēn), n. [< styrol + -ene.] Same as styrol.

styrene (stī'rōn), n. [< styr(ax) + -ene.] Cinnamyl alcohol (C₉H₁₀O), a crystalline solid with a fragrant odor, obtained by treating styracine with caustic potash. It is slightly soluble in water, and volatile at high temperatures.

stythe¹, n. [An irreg. var. of stye.] A sty.

O out of my stythe I [a maiden transformed to a beast] winna rise . . .

Till Kempion, the Kingis son,

Cum to the crag, and thrice kiss me.

Kempion (Child's Ballads, I. 140).

And, at last, into the very swine's stythe,

The Queen brought forth a son.

Faust Foodrager (Child's Ballads, III. 43).

stythe² (stith), n. [More prop. stithe; cf. E. stith, stithing; prob. a var. of stire, after stith, stith, strong; see stith.] Choke-damp; after-damp; black-damp; the mixture of gases left after an explosion of fire-damp, and consisting chiefly of carbonic-acid gas; also, more rarely, this gas accumulated in perceptible quantity in any part of a coal-mine, whether arising from respiration of men or animals, from the use of gunpowder, or from the burning of lamps or candles. [Lancashire, Eng., coal-field.]

Shallow and badly ventilated mines produce stythe. Gresley.

styward, n. A Middle English form of steward.

Styx (stiks), n. [< L. Styx, < Gr. Στῆξ (Στῆξ-), a river of the infernal regions, lit. 'the Hateful,' < στυγνέω, hate, abominate.] 1. In Gr. myth., a river of the lower world.—2. [NL.] In zool., a genus of butterflies, of the subfamily Pierina. Staudinger, 1876.

Suabian, a. and n. Same as Swabian.

suability (sū-ā-bil'i-ti), n. [< suable + -ity.] Liability to be sued; the state of being suable, or subject by law to civil process.

suable (sū-ā-bl), a. [< su + -able.] Capable of being or liable to be sued; subject by law to civil process.

suade (swād), v. t. [< OF. suader = Sp. suadir = It. suadere, < L. suadere, advise, urge, persuade; see suasion, and cf. dissuade, persuade.] To persuade.

suadible (swā'di-bl), a. [< suade + -ible.] Same as suasible.

Suæda (sū-ē'dj), n. [NL. (Forskål, 1775), from an Ar. name.] A genus of apetalous plants, of the order Chenopodiaceæ and series Spirolobeæ, type of the tribe Suædeæ. It is characterized by fleshy linear leaves, and flowers with a five-lobed persistent perianth from which the enclosed utricle is nearly or quite free. There are about 45 species, natives of seashores and salt deserts. They are erect or prostrate herbs or shrubs, green or glaucous, and either simple or diffusely branched. Their leaves are usually terete and entire, and their flowers small and nearly or quite sessile in the axils. S. linearis is a small sea-coast plant of the Atlantic coast from Nova Scotia to Florida; 6 or 7 other species occur westward. S. frutescens, known as sea-rosemary, shrubby goosefoot, or white glasswort, an erect branching evergreen common in the Mediterranean region, is one of the plants formerly burned to produce barilla. For S. maritima, also called sea-goosefoot, see sea-bite, under bite.

Suædeæ (sū-ē'dē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Moquin, 1852), < Suæda + -ææ.] A tribe of apetalous plants, of the order Chenopodiaceæ and suborder Chenopodieæ. It is characterized by an anointed stem with mostly linear, terete, or ovate leaves, and by its fruit, a utricle included in the unchanged or appendaged perianth, the seed-coat crustaceous or finally membranous, and the embryo spiral. It includes five genera, four monotypic and occurring in saline regions in Persia and central Asia; for the other, the type, see Suæda.

suaget, swaget (swāj), v. [< ME. swagen; by apheresis from assuage.] I. trans. To make quiet; soothe; assuage.

Mayne were tho freikes and the folke all
And swiftly thai swere, suagit these herties,
To be lill to the lord all his lyltyme.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), i. 13643.

Sir R. Gylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 73.

suant¹ (sū'ant), a. [Also suent, formerly sewant, sewant; < OE. suant, ppr. of suivre, etc., follow; see suc, sequent.] 1. Following; sequent; pursuing. Halliwel (under suent).—2. Smooth; even.

The Middlesex Cattle Show goes off here with éclat annually, as if all the joints of the agricultural machine were suent. Thorau, Walden, p. 37.

[Prov. Eng. and New Eng. in both senses.]

suant² (sū'ant), n. [Formerly also sewant; origin uncertain.] The plaice. Halliwel (under sewant). [Prov. Eng.]

Behold some others ranged all along

To take the sewant, yea, the flounder sweet.

J. Denys (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 171).

The shad that in the springtime cometh in;

The suant swift, that is not set by least.

J. Denys (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 175).

suantly (sū'ant-li), adv. Evenly; smoothly; regularly. Also suantly. [Prov. New Eng.]

suarrow (sū-ar'ō), n. A variant of sonari.

suasible (swā'si-bl), a. [= Sp. suasible = It. suasibile, < L. suadere, pp. suasus, advise, urge; see suade, suasion. Cf. suadible.] Same as persuasible. Bailey, 1731. [Rare.]

suasion (swā'zhon), n. [< ME. suacyon, < OF. suasion = It. suasione, < L. suasio(n)], an advising, a counseling, exhortation, < suadere, pp. suasus, advise, counsel, urge, persuade (cf. LL. suadus, persuasive, L. Suadita, the goddess of persuasion), < suavis, orig. suadris*, pleasant, sweet; see suare, suave.] The act or effort of persuading; the use of persuasive means or efforts; now chiefly in the phrase moral suasion.

The suacyon of swetenesse rethoryen.

Chaucer, Boethius, ii. prose 1.

Thei had, by the subtilt suasion of the deuill, broken the thirde commandement in tasting the forboden fruite. Sir T. More, Works, p. 157.

She did not dare to come down the path to shake her, and moral suasion at the distance of sixty or seventy feet is very ineffective. T. C. Crawford, English Life, p. 184.

suasive (swā'siv), a. [< OF. suasif = Sp. It. suasivo, < L. suadere, pp. suasus, advise, urge; see suade, suasion.] Having power to persuade; persuasive. [Archaic and poetical.]

Its [justice's] command over them was but suasive and political. South, Sermons, I. ii.

suasively (swā'siv-li), adv. So as to persuade. Let a true tale . . . be suasively told them.

Cartile, French Rev., i. iii. 2.

suasory (swā'sō-rī), a. [= OF. suasore = Sp. Pg. It. suasorio, < L. suasorius, of or pertaining to advice or persuasion, < suasor, one who advises or persuades. < suadere, advise, persuade: see suade, suasion.] Tending to persuade; persuasive.

A Suasory or Enticing Temptation.

Ep. Hopkins, Expos. of the Lord's Prayer, Works, I. 140.

suave (swāv or swāv), a. [< F. suave = Sp. Pg. suave = It. suave, < L. suavis, orig. suavē = Gr. hōc, sweet, agreeable, = AS. sweete, E. sweet: see sweet. (< F. suade, suasion, etc.) Soothingly agreeable; pleasant; mollifying; bland; used of persons or things: as, a suave diplomatist; suave politeness.

Mr. Hall, . . . to whom the husky oat-cake was, from custom, suave as manna, seemed in his best spirits.

Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, xxvi.

What gentle, suave, courteous tones!

Mrs. H. Jackson, Ramona, I.

suavely (swāv'- or swāv'li), adv. In a suave or soothing manner; blandly: as, to speak suavely. suavify (swāv'i-fī), v. t. [< L. suavis, sweet, + facere, make (see -fy).] To make affable. Imp. Dict.

suaviloquent (swā-vil'ō-kwent), a. [< LL. suaviloquent(-t)-s, speaking sweetly, < L. suavis, sweet, + loquens(-t)-s, ppr. of loqui, speak.] Speaking suavely or blandly; using soothing or agreeable speech. Bailey, 1727.

suaviloquy (swā-vil'ō-kwi), n. [< LL. suaviloquium, sweet speaking, < L. suaviloquus, speaking sweetly, < suavis, sweet, + loqui, speak.] Sweetness of speech. Compare suaviloquent.

suavity (swāv'i-ti), n. [< F. suavité = Sp. suavidad = Pg. suavidade = It. suavità, suavità, < L. suavitas(-t)-s, sweetness, pleasantness, < suavis, sweet, pleasant: see suave.] 1. Pleasant or soothing quality or manner; agreeableness; blandness: as, suavity of manner or address. Our own people . . . greatly lack suavity, and show a comparative inattention to minor civilities.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 431.

The worst that can be said of it [Pergino's style] is that its suavity inclines to mawkishness, and that its quietism borders upon sleepiness.

J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 75.

Hence — 2. Pl. suavities (-tiz). That which is suave, bland, or soothing.

The elegances and suavities of life die out one by one as we sink through the social scale.

O. W. Holmes, Professor, vi.

3t. Sweetness to the senses; a mild or agreeable quality. Johnson.

She [Rachel] desired them [the mandrakes] for rarity, pulchritude, or suavity. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vii. 7. = Syn. 1. Urbanity, amenity, civility, courtesy.

sub- [ME. sub- = OF. sub-, sou-, F. sub-, sub- = Pr. sub- = Sp. Pg. It. sub-, < L. sub, prep. with abl., under, before, near; of time, toward, up to, just after; in comp., under (of place), secretly (of action); the b remains in comp. unchanged, except before c, f, g, p, where it is usually, and before m and r, where it is often assimilated (suc-, suf-, sug-, sup-, sur-); also in another form subs, in comp. sub-, as in suscipere, undertake, sustinere, sustain, etc., reduced to su- before a radical s, as in suscipere, look under, suscipere, inspire; prob. = Gr. hupō, under (see hypo-), with initial s as in super = Gr. hupō (see super-, hyper-): see up and over. Cf. subter-.] A prefix of Latin origin, meaning 'under, below, beneath,' or 'from under.' (a) It occurs in its literal sense in many words, verbs, adjectives, and nouns, taken from the Latin, as in subagent, underlying, subscribe, underwrite, subside, sit down, submerge, plunge down, etc., the literal sense being in many cases not felt in English, as in subject, subjoin, subtract, etc. (b) It also expresses an inferior or subordinate part or degree, as in subdivide, especially with adjectives, where it is equivalent to the English -ish, meaning 'somewhat, rather,' as in subacid, sourish, subdulc, sweetish, etc., being in these greatly extended in modern use, as an accepted English formative, applicable not only to adjectives of Latin origin, especially in scientific use, as in subacute, subcordate, subcuneate, etc., but to words of other origin, as subhuman, blendic. (c) It is also freely used with nouns denoting an agent or a division, to denote an inferior or subordinate agent or division, as in subandean, subprior, subgenus, subspecies, etc., not only with Latin but with nouns of other origin, as in subvander, submarshal, subfreshman, etc., where it is equivalent to under- or deputy, and is usually written with a hyphen. (d) In many cases, especially where it has been assimilated, as in suc-, suf-, sug-, sup-, sur-, the force of the prefix is not felt in English, and the word is to English apprehension a primitive, as in sucor, suffer, suggest, support, summon, surrender, etc. In technical use sub- denotes — (e) In zool. and anat.: (1) inferiority in kind, quality, character, degree, extent, and the like. It is prefixed almost at will to adjectives admitting of comparison, and in its various applications may be rendered by 'less than, not quite, not exactly, somewhat, nearly, hardly, almost,' etc.; it often has the diminishing or depreciating force of the suffix -ish; it is sometimes prefixed, like about, merely to avoid committal to more precise or exact statement, but in a few cases implies unlikeliness amounting to oppositeness and so to negation of some character or attribute, with the meaning nearly of quasi or pseudo. A particular case indicates taxonomic inferiority, or subordination in classificatory grade, of any group from subkingdom to subvariety: it is the sense (c) above noted, and the same as the botanical sense (2) below. (2) Inferiority in place or position; lowness of relative location. This sense is more definite, and the meaning of 'lower than' may usually be rendered by 'under, underneath, beneath, below,' sometimes by 'on the under side of.' This sub- is synonymous with infra- or infero-, and with hypo-, and is the opposite of super- or hyper-, and sometimes epi-. (1) In bot., (1) with adjectives, literal position beneath, as in subcortical, subgenital, subepidermal, subpetiolar, etc.; (2) with classificatory terms, a systematic grade next lower than that of the stem-word, as in suborder, subgenus, subspecies; (3) with adjectives and adverbs, an inferior degree or extent, 'somewhat, to some extent, imperfectly,' as in subangulose, subacrescending, subcaudate, subcanalate, etc. (9) In chem., the fact that the member of the compound with which it is connected is in relative minimum; thus, subacetate of lead is a compound of lead and acetic acid which is capable of combining with more acetic acid radicals, but not with more lead. [As sub- in most of the uses noted above is now established as an English formative, it is to be treated, like under-, in similar cases, as applicable in modern use in any instance where it may be wanted; and of the modern compounds so formed only the principal ones are entered below, usually without further etymological note. Many of the adjectives have two meanings, the mode of formation differing accordingly: thus, subabdominal, 'situated under the abdomen,' is formed < L. sub, under, + abdomen (abdomin-), abdomen, -al; while subabdominal, 'not quite abdominal,' is < sub- + abdominal. For the full etymology of these words, when not given below, see sub- and the other member of the compound. The less familiar compounds with sub- are often written with a hyphen; it is here uniformly omitted.]

sub (sub), n. [Contr. of subaltern or subordinate.] A subaltern; a subordinate. [Colloq.]

"Ah, when we were subs together in camp in 1803, what a lively fellow Charley Baynes was!" his comrade, Colonel Bunch, would say. Thackeray, Philip, xvi.

suba, n. See subah.

subabdominal (sub-ab-dom'i-nal), a. [= F. subabdominal; as sub- + abdominal.] 1. Situated below or beneath the abdomen: as, the subabdominal appendages of a crustacean. — 2. Not quite abdominal in position, as the ventral fins of a fish.

subacetate (sub-as'e-tāt), n. A basic acetate — that is, one in which there are one or more equivalents of the basic radical which may combine with the acid anhydrid to form a normal acetate: as, subacetate of lead; subacetate of copper (verdigris).

subacid (sub-as'id), a. and n. [= Sp. subácido = It. subacido, < L. subacidus, somewhat sour, < sub, under, + acidus, sour: see acid.] I. a. 1. Moderately acid or sour: as, a subacid juice. Arbutinot. — 2. Hence, noting words or a temperament verging on acidity or somewhat biting.

A little subacid kind of drollish impatience in his nature. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, viii. 26.

II. n. A substance moderately acid. subacidity (sub-a-sil'i-ti), n. The state of being subacid; also, that which is slightly acid or acid.

A theologic subacidity. The Atlantic, LXVII. 411.

subacidulous (sub-a-sid'ū-lus), a. Moderately acidulous.

Tasting a thimbleful of rich Canary, honeyed Cyprus, or subacidulous Hock. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 291.

subacid (sub-ak'rid), a. Moderately acid, sharp, or pungent. Sir J. Floyer.

subacromial (sub-a-krō'mi-al), a. [< L. sub, under, + NL. acromion: see acromial.] Situated below the acromion: as, a subacromial bursa.

subact (sub-akt'), v. t. [< L. subactus, pp. of subigere, bring under, subdue, < sub, under, + agere, lead, bring: see act.] To reduce; subdue; subject. Evelyn, True Religion, II. 375.

subact (sub-akt'), a. [ME. < L. subactus, pp.: see the verb.] Reduced; subdued.

In November and Marche her branches sette In domaged lande subact.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 122.

subaction (sub-ak'shon), n. [< L. subactio(-n)-, a working through or up, preparation: see sub-act.] 1. The act of reducing, or the state of being reduced; reduction. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 538. — 2. A substance reduced.

subacuminate (sub-g-kū'mi-nāt), a. Somewhat acuminate.

subacute (sub-g-kūt'), a. Noting a condition just below that of acuteness, in any sense.

subacutely (sub-g-kūt'li), adv. In a subacute manner.

subaërial (sub-ā-ē-ri-al), a. In geol., formed, produced, or deposited in the open air, and not beneath the sea, or under water, or below the surface; not submarine or subterranean: thus, subaërial denudation or erosion. See aërial, 2.

subagency (sub-ā-jen-sī), n. A delegated agency.

subagent (sub-ā-jent), n. In law, the agent of an agent.

subah (sū'bā), n. [Also suba, soubah: < Pers. Hind. subah, a province.] 1. A division or province of the Mogul empire. Yule and Burnell. — 2. An abbreviation of sabadar.

subahdar (sū-bā-dar'), n. [Also soubahdar, soubadar: < Pers. Hind. subahdar, 'subah, a province, + -dar, holding, keeping.] 1. Originally, a lord of a subah or province; hence, a local commandant or chief officer. — 2. The chief native officer of a company of sepoy. Yule and Burnell.

subaid (sub-ād'), v. t. To give secret or private aid to. Daniel. [Rare.]

subalmoner (sub-al'mon-er), n. A subordinate almoner. Wood.

subalpine (sub-al'pin), a. [= F. subalpin = Pg. subalpino, < L. subalpinus, lying near the Alps, < sub, under, + Alpinus, Alpine: see alpin.] 1. Living or growing on mountains at an elevation next below the height called alpin. — 2. Lower Alpine: applied to that part or zone of the Alps which lies between the so-called "highland" zone and the "Alpine" zone proper. It extends between the elevations of 4,000 and 5,500 feet approximately, and is especially characterized by the presence of coniferous trees, chiefly firs, which cover a large part of its surface. Large timber-trees rarely reach much above its upper border. Below the subalpine zone is the highland or mountain zone, the region of deciduous trees, and above it the Alpine, which, as this term is generally used, embraces the region extending between the upper limit of trees and the first appearance of permanent snow. Still higher up is the glacial region, comprehending all that part of the Alps which rises above the limit of perpetual snow. The terms alpine and subalpine are sometimes applied to other mountain-chains than the Alps, with signification more or less vaguely accordant with their application to that chain.

subaltern (sub-al'tern or sub-bāl'tern, the former always in the logical sense), a. and n. [< F. subalterne = Sp. Pg. It. subalterno, < ML. subalternus, subaltern, < L. sub, under, + alternus, one after the other, alternate: see altern.] I. a. Having an inferior or subordinate position: subordinate; specifically (milit.), holding the rank of a junior officer usually below the rank of captain.

To this system of religion were tagged several subaltern doctrines. Swift, Tale of a Tub, II.

Subaltern genus, opposition, proposition, etc. See the nouns.

II. n. A subaltern officer; a subordinate.

subalternant (sub-al'tern-ant), a. and n. [= Sp. It. subalternante; as subaltern + -ant.] I. a. In logic, universal, as opposed to particular.

II. n. A universal.

subalternate (sub-al'ter-nāt), a. and n. [< subaltern + -ate.] I. a. 1. Successive; succeeding by turns. Imp. Dict. — 2. Subordinate; subaltern; inferior. Canon Twicker.

II. n. In logic, a particular, as opposed to a universal.

subalternating (sub-al'ter-nā-tīng), a. Succeeding by turns; successive. Imp. Dict.

subalternation (sub-al'ter-nā'shion), n. [= Pg. subalternação; as subaltern + -ion.] 1. The state of inferiority or subjection; the state of being subaltern; succession by turns. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 73. — 2. In logic, an immediate inference from a universal to a particular under it: as, every grain breathes fire; therefore, some animals breathe fire. Some logicians do not admit the validity of this inference.

subanal (sub-ā-nal), a. [< L. sub, under, + anus, anus: see anal.] Situated under the anus; specifically noting a plate or other formation in echinoderms. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLV. 644.

subancestral (sub-an-ses'tral), a. Of collateral ancestry or derivation; not in the direct line of descent. Proc. U. S. Nat. Mus., XI. 588.

subanconeal (sub-ang-kō-nē-āl), a. [< L. sub, under, + NL. anconus: see anconal.] Situated underneath the anconus.

subanconus (sub-ang-kō-nē-us), n. [pl. subancones (-i).] [NL. < L. sub, under, + NL. anconus, q. v.] A small muscle of the back of the elbow, arising from the humerus just above the olecranon fossa, and inserted into the capsular ligament of the elbow-joint. It resembles the subcutaneous of the knee.

subandean (sub-an'dē-an), a. [< sub- + Andes: see Andean.] In geog., subjacent with reference to certain parts of the Andes, and nowhere attaining an altitude so great as that of the highest Andean mountains: specifying a certain faunal area. (See below.)—Subandean subregion, in zoogeog., one of four subregions into which the continent of South America (with the islands appertaining thereto) has been divided by A. Newton. It includes a not well defined northerly section of the continent with the islands of Tobago, Trinidad, and the Galapagos, and takes in all the South American countries that do not belong to the Amazonian, Brazilian, or Patagonian subregion. The Subandean subregion includes what has also been called the Colombian or (Colombian), but is more extensive. It is recognized upon ornithological grounds, and said to possess 72 peculiar genera of birds. Encyc. Brit., III, 744.

subangled (sub-ang'gld), a. Same as subangular.—Subangled wave. See wave.

subangular (sub-ang'gū-lār), a. Slightly angular; bluntly angulated. Huxley, Physiography, p. 278.

subangulate, subangulated (sub-ang'gū-lāt, -la-ted), a. Somewhat angled or sharp.

subantichrist (sub-an'ti-krist), n. A person or power partially antagonistic to Christ; a lesser antichrist. Milton, Church-Government, i. 6. [Rare.]

subapennine (sub-ap'e-nin), a. [= F. subapennin, < L. sub, under, + Apenninus, Apennine: see Apennine.] Being at the base or foot of the Apennines.—Subapennine series, in geol., a series of rocks of Pliocene age, developed in Italy on the flanks of the Apennines, and also in Sicily. In the Ligurian region the Pliocene has been divided into Messinian and Astian; in Sicily, into Astian, Pliastian, and Zanclean. In the last region these rocks rise to an elevation of 4,000 feet above the sea-level, and are replete with well-preserved forms of organic life now living in the Mediterranean.

subapical (sub-ap'i-kal), a. [L. sub, under, + apex, point: see apical.] Situated below the apex.

subaponeurotic (sub-ap ō-nē-rot'ik), a. [L. sub, under, + NL. aponeurosis: see aponeurotic.] Situated beneath an aponeurosis.

subapostolic (sub-ap-ōs-tol'ik), a. Of, pertaining to, or constituting the period succeeding that of the apostles: as, subapostolic literature. Encyc. Brit., XI, 854.

subappressed (sub-a-prest'), a. In entom., partly appressed: as, subappressed hairs.

subaquatic (sub-a-kwat'ik), a. 1. Not entirely aquatic, as a wading bird.—2. [= F. sub-aquatique.] Situated or formed in or below the surface of the water: subaqueous.

subaqueous (sub-ā'kwē-us), a. [= It. sub-aqueo; as L. sub, under, + F. aqueus.] Situated, formed, or living under water: subaquatic.

subarachnoid (sub-a-rak'noïd), a. 1. Situated beneath the arachnoid—that is, between that membrane and the pia mater: as, the subarachnoid space.—2. Subdural.—Subarachnoid fluid, the cerebrospinal fluid.—Subarachnoid space, the space between the arachnoid membrane and the pia mater.

subarachnoidal, subarachnoidean (sub-ar-ak-noï'dal, -dē-an), a. Same as subarachnoid. H. Gray, Anat. (ed. 1887), p. 653.

subarborescent (sub-ār-bō-res'ent), a. Having a somewhat tree-like aspect.

subarctic (sub-ārkt'ik), a. Nearly arctic: existing or occurring a little south of the arctic circle: as, a subarctic region or fauna; subarctic animals or plants; a subarctic climate.

subarcuate (sub-ār-kū-āt), a. Somewhat bent or bowed; slightly arcuated.

subarcuated (sub-ār-kū-āt-ed), a. Same as subarcuate.

subareolar (sub-a-rē'ō-lār), a. Situated beneath the mammary areola.—Subareolar abscess, a funicular subcutaneous abscess of the areola of the nipple.

subarmor (sub-ār'mor), n. A piece of armor worn beneath the visible outer defense. J. Hewitt, Anc. Armour, II, 132.

subarrhation (sub-a-rā'shon), n. [< ML. subarratio (n.), < subarrare, betroth, < L. sub, under, + arrha, earnest-money, a pledge: see arrha.] The ancient custom or rite of betrothing by the bestowal, on the part of the man, of marriage gifts or tokens, as money, rings, or other objects, upon the woman. Also subarration.

The prayer which follows . . . takes the place of a long form of blessing which followed the subarrhation in the ancient office. Blount, Annotated Book of Common Prayer, p. 455.

subastragal (sub-as-trag'a-lār), a. Situated beneath the astragalus.—Subastragal amputation, amputation of most of the foot, leaving only the astragalus.

subastragaloid (sub-as-trag'a-loïd), a. Situated beneath or below the astragalus.

subastral (sub-as'tral), a. [< L. sub, under, + astrum, a star: see astral.] Situated beneath the stars or heavens; terrestrial.

subaud (sub-ād'), v. t. [< L. subaudire, supply a word omitted, hear a little, < sub, under, + audire, hear: see audient.] To supply mentally, as a word or an ellipsis. Imp. Dict. [Rare.]

subaudition (sub-ā-dish'ōn), n. [< L. subauditione], the supplying of a word omitted, < subaudire, supply a word omitted: see subaud.] The act of understanding something not expressed; that which is understood or implied from that which is expressed; understood meaning. Horne Tooker.

subaural (sub-ā'ūrāl), a. Situated beneath or below the ear.

subaxillar (sub-ak'si-lār), a. and n. Same as subaxillary.

subaxillary (sub-ak'si-lā-ri), a. and n. 1. a. 1. In zool.: (a) Situated beneath the axilla or armpit. (b) Specifically, in ornith., same as axillary: as, "subaxillary feathers." Pennant.—2. In bot., placed under an axil, or angle formed by the branch of a plant with the stem, or by a leaf with the branch.—Subaxillary region. See region.

II. n.; pl. subaxillares (-riz). In ornith., same as axillar or axillary.

subbass (sub'bās), n. In organ-building, a pedal stop resembling either the open or the stopped diapason, and of 16- or 32-foot tone. Also called subbordon.

subblush (sub-blush'), v. i. To blush slightly. [Rare.]

Raising up her eyes, sub-blushing as she did it. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, ix, 25.

subbordon (sub-bör'don), n. Same as subbass.

subbrachial (sub-brā'ki-āl), a. and n. Same as subbrachiate.

subbrachiate (sub-brā'ki-āt), a. and n. 1. a. Situated under the pectorals, as the ventral fins; having the ventrals under the pectorals, as a fish.

II. n. A subbrachiate fish. See Subbrachiati.

Subbrachiati (sub-brak-i-ā'ti), a. pl. An order of malacopecterygian fishes, containing those which are subbrachiate: contrasted with Apodes and Abdominales. See under Malacopecterygii.

subbrachycephalic (sub-brak i-se-fal'ik or -sef'al-ik), a. Nearly but not quite brachycephalic; somewhat short-headed; having a cephalic index of 80.01 to 83.33 (Broca). Nature, XLi, 357.

subbranch (sub'brānch), n. 1. A subdivision of a branch, in any sense of that word. W. S. Jevons, Money and the Mechanism of Exchange, p. 258.—2. Specifically, in zoological classification, a prime division of a branch or phylum; a subphylum.

subbranchial (sub-brang'ki-āl), a. Situated under the gills.

subbreed (sub'brēd), n. A recognizable strain or marked subdivision of a breed; an incipient artificial race or stock. Darwin.

subbrigadier (sub'brig-a-dēr'), n. An officer in the Horse Guards who ranks as cornet. [Eng.]

subcalcareous (sub-kal-kā'rē-us), a. Somewhat calcareous.

subcalcarine (sub-kal'ka-rin), a. Situated below the calcareus, as of a bird, or below the calcareine fissure of the brain.

subcaliber (sub-kal'i-bēr), a. Of less caliber: said of a projectile as compared with the bore of the gun. See subcaliber projectile, under projectile.

subcantor (sub-kau'tor), n. In music, same as succantor, 1.

subcapsular (sub-kap'sū-lār), a. Situated under a capsule: being in the cavity of a capsule. Lancet, 1889, i, 787.—Subcapsular epithelium, an epithelium lining the inside of the capsule of a spinal ganglion.

Subcarboniferous (sub-kār-bō-nif'ē-rus), a. and a. In geol., a name given by some geologists to the mountain-limestone division of the Carboniferous series, or that part of the series which lies beneath the millstone-grit. See carboniferous.

subcartilaginous (sub-kār-ti-lāj'i-nus), a. 1. Situated below or beneath cartilage; lying under the costal cartilages; hypochondrial.—2. Partly or incompletely cartilaginous.

subcaudal (sub-kā'dal), a. and n. 1. a. 1. Situated under the tail; placed on the under side of the tail: as, subcaudal chevron-bones; the subcaudal scutes, or rosettes, of a snake.—2. Not quite caudal or terminal; situated near the tail or tail-end; subterminal.—Subcaudal pouch, a pocket or recess beneath the root of the tail of the badger, above the anus, into which empty the secretions of certain subcaudal glands distinct from the ordinary anal or perineal glands of other Mustelidae.

II. n. A subclavian artery, vein, nerve, or muscle.

subclavicular (sub-klā-vik'ū-lār), a. Situated below the clavicle; infraclavicular; subclavian.—Subclavicular aneurism, an aneurism of the axillary artery situated too high to be ligated below the clavicle.—Subclavicular fossa, the space depression below the outer end of the clavicle.—Subclavicular region, same as infraclavicular region (which see, under infraclavicular).

subclavius (sub-klā'vi-us), n.; pl. subclavii (-ī). [NL.: see subclavian.] A muscle passing from the first rib to the under surface of the clavicle or collar-bone.—Subclavius posticus. Same as sternocleidomastoid.

II. n. That which is subcaudal; specifically, in herpet., a rosette; one of the special scutes upon the under side of the tail of a serpent.

subcaudate (sub-kā'dāt), a. 1. In entom., having an imperfect tail-like process: as, butterflies with subcaudate wings.—2. In bot. See sub (-f) 3.

subcelestial (sub-sē-les'ti-āl), a. Being beneath the heavens.

The superlunary but subcelestial world. Harvey, Irenaeus, p. xxvii.

subcellar (sub-sel'sār), n. A cellar beneath another cellar.

subcentral (sub-sen'tral), a. 1. Being under the center.—2. Nearly central; a little eccentric.

subcentrally (sub-sen'tral-i), adv. 1. Under the center.—2. Nearly centrally.

subchanter (sub'chān'tēr), n. In music, same as subcantor, succantor, 1.

subchela (sub-kē'lā), n.; pl. subchela (-lā). The hooked end of an appendage which bends down upon the joint to which it is articulated, but has no other movable claw to oppose it and thus make a nipper or chela.

subchelate (sub-kē'lāt), a. Of the nature of or provided with a subchela. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 327.

subcheliform (sub-kē'li-fōrm), a. Subchelate. Eng. Cyc. Nat. Hist. (1855), III, 87.

subchlorid, subchloride (sub'klō'rīd), n. A compound of chlorine with an element two atoms of which form a bivalent radical: as, subchlorid of copper (Cu_2Cl_2); subchlorid of mercury (Hg_2Cl_2 , calomel).

subchondral (sub-kon'dral), a. Lying underneath cartilage; subcartilaginous: as, subchondral osseous tissue.

subchordal (sub-kōr'dal), a. Situated beneath the chorda dorsalis, or notochord, of a vertebrate. Compare parachordal.

subchoroid (sub-kō'roid), a. Same as subchoroidal.

subchoroidal (sub-kō-roi'dal), a. Situated beneath the choroid tunic of the eye.—Subchoroidal dropsy, morbid accumulation of fluid between the adherent choroid sclerotic and the retina.

subcinctorium (sub-sing-kō'tō-ri-um), n.; pl. subcinctoria (-ī). See succinctorium.

subclass (sub'klās), n. A prime subdivision of a class; in zool. and bot., a division or group of a grade between the class and the order; a superorder.

subclavate (sub-klā'vāt), a. Somewhat clavate; slightly enlarged toward the end.—Subclavate antennae, in entom., antennae in which the outer joints are somewhat larger than the basal ones, but without forming a distinct club.

subclavian (sub-klā'vi-an), a. and n. [< L. sub, under, + clavis, a key: see clavis, and cf. clavicle.] 1. a. 1. Lying or extending under, beneath, or below the clavicle or collar-bone; subclavicular.—2. Pertaining to the subclavian artery or vein: as, the subclavian triangle or groove.—Subclavian artery, the principal artery of the root of the neck, arising on the right side from the innominate artery and on the left from the arch of the aorta, and ending in the axillary artery; the beginning or main trunk of the arterial system of the fore limb. See cuts under limb and embryo.—Subclavian groove. (a) A shallow depression on the surface of the first rib, denoting the situation of a subclavian vessel. There are two of them, separated by a tubercle, respectively in front of and behind the insertion of the anterior scalene muscle—the former for the subclavian vein, the latter for the subclavian artery. (b) A groove on the under side of the clavicle, for the insertion of the subclavius.—Subclavian muscle, the subclavius.—Subclavian nerve, the motor nerve of the subclavius muscle, arising from the fifth cervical nerve at its junction with the sixth.—Subclavian triangle. See triangle.—Subclavian vein, the continuation of the axillary vein from the lower border of the first rib to the sternoclavicular articulation, where the vessel ends by joining the internal jugular to form the innominate vein. See cut under limb.

II. n. A subclavian artery, vein, nerve, or muscle.

subclavicular (sub-klā-vik'ū-lār), a. Situated below the clavicle; infraclavicular; subclavian.—Subclavicular aneurism, an aneurism of the axillary artery situated too high to be ligated below the clavicle.—Subclavicular fossa, the space depression below the outer end of the clavicle.—Subclavicular region, same as infraclavicular region (which see, under infraclavicular).

subclavius (sub-klā'vi-us), n.; pl. subclavii (-ī). [NL.: see subclavian.] A muscle passing from the first rib to the under surface of the clavicle or collar-bone.—Subclavius posticus. Same as sternocleidomastoid.

II. n. That which is subcaudal; specifically, in herpet., a rosette; one of the special scutes upon the under side of the tail of a serpent.

subcaudate (sub-kā'dāt), a. 1. In entom., having an imperfect tail-like process: as, butterflies with subcaudate wings.—2. In bot. See sub (-f) 3.

subcelestial (sub-sē-les'ti-āl), a. Being beneath the heavens.

The superlunary but subcelestial world. Harvey, Irenaeus, p. xxvii.

subcellar (sub-sel'sār), n. A cellar beneath another cellar.

subcentral (sub-sen'tral), a. 1. Being under the center.—2. Nearly central; a little eccentric.

subcentrally (sub-sen'tral-i), adv. 1. Under the center.—2. Nearly centrally.

subchanter (sub'chān'tēr), n. In music, same as subcantor, succantor, 1.

subchela (sub-kē'lā), n.; pl. subchela (-lā). The hooked end of an appendage which bends down upon the joint to which it is articulated, but has no other movable claw to oppose it and thus make a nipper or chela.

subchelate (sub-kē'lāt), a. Of the nature of or provided with a subchela. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 327.

subcheliform (sub-kē'li-fōrm), a. Subchelate. Eng. Cyc. Nat. Hist. (1855), III, 87.

subchlorid, subchloride (sub'klō'rīd), n. A compound of chlorine with an element two atoms of which form a bivalent radical: as, subchlorid of copper (Cu_2Cl_2); subchlorid of mercury (Hg_2Cl_2 , calomel).

subchondral (sub-kon'dral), a. Lying underneath cartilage; subcartilaginous: as, subchondral osseous tissue.

Subcoccinella (sub-kok-si-nel'ä), n. [NL., < sub + Coccinella.] A genus of ladybirds or coccinellids based by Huber (1841) upon the widespread S. 24-punctata. Also called Lasia.

subcollateral (sub-kol-lat'e-räl), a. Situated below the collateral fissure of the brain.

subcommission (sub'ko-mish'ön), n. An under-commission; a division of a commission.

subcommissioner (sub'ko-mish'ön-ër), n. A subordinate commissioner.

subcommittee (sub'ko-mit'ë), n. An under-committee; a part or division of a committee.

subconcave (sub-kon'käv), a. Slightly concave.

subconcealed (sub-kon-seld'), a. Hidden underneath. Roger North, Examen, p. 430. (Darics.)

subconchoidal (sub-kong-koi'däl), a. Imperfectly conchoidal; having an imperfectly conchoidal fracture.

subconical (sub-kon'i-käl), a. Somewhat or not quite conical; conoidal.

subconjunctival (sub-kon-jungk-ti'väl), a. Situated beneath the conjunctiva.

subconnate (sub-kon'ät), a. In entom., partially connate; divided by an indistinct or partial suture.

subconscious (sub-kon'shus), a. 1. Partially or feebly conscious; of or pertaining to sub-consciousness.—2. Being or occurring in the mind, but not in consciousness.

subconsciously (sub-kon'shus-li), adv. In a subconscious manner; with faint consciousness; without consciousness.

subconsciousness (sub-kon'shus-nes), n. 1. A form or state of consciousness in which there is little strength or distinctness of perception or mental action in general.—2. Mental processes conceived as taking place without consciousness.

The hypothesis of unconscious mental modifications, as it has been unfortunately termed—the hypothesis of subconsciousness, as we may style it to avoid this contradiction in terms. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX, 47.

subconstellation (sub'kon-ste-lä'shön), n. A subordinate or secondary constellation.

subcontiguous (sub-kon-tig'ü-us), a. Almost touching; very slightly separated; as, subcontiguous coxae.

subcontinuous (sub-kon-tin'ü-us), a. Almost continuous; noting a line or mark which has but slight breaks or interruptions.

subcontract (sub'kon'trakt), n. A contract under a previous contract.

subcontract (sub-kon'trakt'), v. t. To make a contract under a previous contract. Lancet, 1889, I, 498.

subcontracted (sub-kon-trak'ted), a. 1. Contracted under a former contract; betrothed for the second time. Shak., Learn, v. 3, 86.—2. In entom., slightly narrowed; noting wing-cells.

subcontractor (sub'kon-trak'tör), n. One who takes a part or the whole of a contract from the principal contractor.

subcontrariety (sub'kon-tra-rä'ti), n.; pl. subcontraries (-tiz). In logic, the relation between a particular affirmative and a particular negative proposition in the same terms; also, the inference from one to the other.

subcontrary (sub-kon'trä-ri), a. and n. 1. a. Contrary in an inferior degree. (a) In geom., it denotes the relative position of two similar triangles of which one of the pairs of homologous angles coincide while the including sides are interchanged. Thus, in the cut

(b) In logic the term is applied (1) to the particular affirmative proposition and the particular negative proposition, with relation to the universal affirmative proposition above them, which have the same subject and predicate; thus, "some man is mortal" and "some man is not mortal" are subcontrary propositions, with relation to "every man is mortal" and "no man is mortal," which are contraries; (2) to the relation between two attributes which co-exist in the same substance, yet in such a way that the more there is of one the less there is of the other.—Subcontrary section, one of the circular sections of a quadric cone in its relation to another circular section not parallel to it.

II. n.; pl. subcontraries (-riz). In logic, a subcontrary proposition.

subconvex (sub-kon'veks), a. Somewhat rounded or convex.

subcoracoid (sub-kor'a-koid), a. Situated or occurring below the coracoid process.

subcordate (sub-kör'dät), a. Nearly heart-shaped.

subcordiform (sub-kör'di-förin), a. Same as subcordate.

subcorneous (sub-kör'nē-us), a. 1. Somewhat horny; partly or partially converted into horn.—2. Placed beneath a layer of corneous structure; situated under or within a horn, nail, claw, or the like; as, the subcorneous frontal processes of a ruminant.

subcortical (sub-kör'ti-käl), a. Situated beneath the cortex. (a) Situated beneath the cerebral cortex. (b) Situated beneath the cortex of a sponge. (c) Situated or lying beneath the cortex or bark of a tree.

subcosta (sub-kos'tä), n.; pl. subcostae (-të). The subcostal vein or nervure of the wing of some insects; the first vein behind the costa. See cut under costal.

subcostal (sub-kos'täl), a. and n. I. a. 1. In anat. and zool.: (a) Situated below a rib; extending from one rib to a succeeding one; infracostal; specifically noting the muscles called subcostalis. (b) Lying along the under side or edge of a rib; as, a subcostal groove for an artery. (c) Placed under or within the ribs or costal cartilages collectively; hypochondrial; subcartilaginous.—2. In entom., situated near, but not at or on, the costa; specifically noting the subcostal.—Subcostal angle, the angle which the costal border of one side forms with that of the other at the lower end of the sternum.—Subcostal cells, in entom., cells between the costal and subcostal veins; they are generally numbered from the base outward.—Subcostal vein or nervure, in entom., a strong longitudinal vein behind the costal vein and more or less parallel to the costal edge; in the Lepidoptera it forms the anterior edge of the large dorsal cell, and exteriorly it is divided into a number of branches, called subcostal veins or nervures, and numbered from before backward. Sometimes called postcostal vein or nervure. See cut under costal.

II. n. 1. In zool. and quat.: (a) A subcostal or infracostal muscle. See subcostalis. (b) A subcostal artery, vein, or nerve, running along the groove in the lower border of a rib; an intercostal.—2. In entom., a subcostal vein or nervure; the subcosta.

subcostalis (sub-kos-tä'lis), n.; pl. subcostalis (-lëz). In anat., a subcostal or infracostal muscle; any one of several muscles which extend from the lower border or inner surface of a rib to the first, second, or third succeeding rib.

subcranial (sub-krä'ni-äl), a. 1. Situated beneath the skull, in general.—2. Situated below the cranial axis or cranium proper—that is, in man, in front of the brain-case; as, the subcranial visceral arches of the embryo.

subcrenate (sub-kre'nät), a. Obscurely or irregularly scalloped.

subcrepitant (sub-krep'i-tänt), a. Approaching in character the crepitant rale. See rale. Therapeutic Gaz., IX, 8.

subcrepitation (sub-krep-i-tä'shön), n. The noise of subcrepitant rales.

subcrescentic (sub-kre-sen'tik), a. Irregularly or imperfectly crescentic.

subcruræus (sub-kro'rë-us), n.; pl. subcruræi (-i). A small muscle arising from the fore part of the femur, beneath the crureus, and inserted into the synovial pouch of the knee. Also called subcruralis, subfemorialis, and articularis genu.

subcrureal (sub-kro'rë-äl), a. Lying under or beneath the cruræus, as a muscle; specifying the subcruræus.

subcrystalline (sub-kris'tä-lin), a. Imperfectly crystalline.

subcultrate (sub-kul'trät), a. Somewhat cultriform; like a colter in being curved along one edge and straight along the other. Also subcultrated.

subculture (sub-kul'tür), n. In bacteriology, a culture derived from a previous culture.

subcutaneous (sub-kü-tä'në-us), a. 1. Situated beneath the skin, in general; subdermal; lying in the true skin or cutis, under the cuticle; subcuticular; placed or performed under the skin; hypodermic; as, a subcutaneous injection.—2. Fitted for use under the skin; hypodermic; as, a subcutaneous syringe; a subcutaneous saw.—3. Living under the skin; burrowing in the skin; as, a subcutaneous parasitic insect.—Subcutaneous feeding, a mode of artificial feeding by means of large hypodermic injections of nutrient substances.—Subcutaneous fracture, simple fracture.—Subcutaneous method, the mode or manner of performing surgical operations, as tenotomy, osteotomy, etc., with the smallest possible opening through the skin.

subcutaneously (sub-kü-tä'në-us-li), adv. In a subcutaneous manner, in any sense; hypodermically.

subcuticular (sub-kü-tik'ü-lär), a. Situated under the cuticle or scarf-skin; subepidermic; cutaneous; dermal.

subcutis (sub'kü-tis), n. [NL., < L. sub, under, + cutis, skin.] The deeper part of the cutis, corium, or true skin, sometimes distinguished from the rest. Haeckel.

subcylindric, subcylindrical (sub-si-lin'drik, -äri-käl), a. Nearly or somewhat cylindrical.

subdatary (sub'dä-tä-ri), n. The head of the officials under the datary or podatary. See datary 1.

subdeacon (sub'dë-kn'), n. [ME. suddhean, suddhean = OF. suddhean, also soudaier = Sp. subdiacono = Pg. subdiacono = It. subdiacono, < LL. subdiaconus, < L. sub, under, + LL. diaconus, a deacon; see diacon.] A member of the ecclesiastical order next below that of deacon. Subdeacons are first mentioned in the third century. They assisted the deacons, and kept order at the doors of the church. In the Western Church the duty of the subdeacon is to prepare the holy vessels and the bread, wine, and water for the eucharist, to pour the water into the chalice, and, since the seventh or eighth century, to read the epistle—a duty previously, as still in the East, assigned to the reader. In the Greek Church the subdeacon prepares the holy vessels, and guards the gates of the bema during liturgy. In the Greek Church the subdiaconate has always been one of the minor orders. In the Western Church it became one of the major or holy orders in the twelfth century. The bishop, priest, or other cleric who acts as second or subordinate assistant at the eucharist is called the subdeacon, and the term is used in this sense in the Anglican Church also, although that church has no longer an order of subdeacons. See epistler.

subdeaconry (sub'dë-kn-ri), n. [< subdeacon + -ry.] Same as subdeaconship.

subdeaconship (sub'dë-kn-ship), n. The order or office of subdeacon; the subdiaconate.

subdean (sub'dën), n. [ME. suddene, sudene, also southdene, < OF. soudene, soudene, < ML. subdecanus, subdean, < L. sub, under, + decanus, dean; see dean 2.] A vice-dean; a dean's substitute or vicegerent.

Secutors and subdeans. Piers Plowman (C), xvii, 277.

subdeanery (sub'dë-në-ri), n. [< subdean + -ry.] The office or rank of subdean.

subdecanal (sub-dek'ä-näl), a. [< ML. subdecanus, subdean, + -äl.] Relating to a subdean or his office.

subdecimal (sub-des'i-mäl), a. Derived by division by a multiple of ten.

subdecuple (sub-dek'ü-pl), a. Containing one part of ten (Johnson); having the ratio 1:10.

subdelegate (sub'del-ë-gät), n. A subordinate delegate.

subdelegate (sub-del'ë-gät), v. t. To appoint to act as subdelegate or under another.

subdelirium (sub-dë-lir'i-um), n. Mild delirium with lucid intervals.

subdeltoidal (sub-del-toi'däl), a. Approaching in shape the Greek letter Δ . Also subdeltoid.

subdentate (sub-den'tät), a. 1. Imperfectly dentate; having indistinct teeth; denticulate.—2. Of cetaceans, having teeth in the lower jaw only; the opposite of superdentate. Darwin, 1834. [Rare.]

subdentated (sub-den'tä-ted), a. Same as subdentate, 1.

subdented (sub-den'ted), a. Indented beneath. Imp. Dict.

subdepressed (sub-dë-prest'), a. Somewhat depressed or flattened.

subderisorious (sub-der-i-sö-ri-us), a. [< L. sub, under, + derisorius, serving for laughter, ridiculing; see derisory.] Ridiculing with moderation or delicacy. Dr. H. More.

subderivative (sub-dë-riv'ä-tiv), n. A word following another in immediate grammatical derivation, or a word derived from a derivative and not directly from the root. [Rare.]

subdermal (sub-dër-mäl), a. Beneath the skin; hypodermal; subcutaneous.

subdeterminant (sub-dë-tër'mi-nänt), n. In math., a determinant from a symmetrically taken part of a matrix.

subdiaconate (sub-di-ak'ö-nät), n. [< ML. subdiaconatus, < LL. subdiaconus, subdeacon; see subdeacon.] The office or order of subdeacon.

subdial (sub'di-äl), a. [= OF. subdial, < L. subdialis, subdialis, that is in the open air, < sub, under, + dialis, the sky, the open air, akin to dis, day, Skt. dyu, the sky; see diety, dial.] Of or pertaining to the open air; being under the open sky. Imp. Dict. [Rare.]

The Athenian Heliaetick or Subdial Court was trial and for the most part kept in the open air. N. Brown, iv, 15.

subdialect (sub'di-ä-lect), n. An inferior dialect; a subordinate or less important or prominent dialect.

subdiapente (sub-di-ä-pen'të), n. In medieval music, an interval of a fifth below a given tone.

subdiatessaron (sub-dī-a-tes'a-ron), n. In musical notation, an interval of a fourth below a given tone.

subdichotomy (sub-di-kot'ō-mi), n. A subordinate or inferior dichotomy, or division into pairs; a subdivision. Milton, Areopagitica, p. 53.

subdistinction (sub-dis-tink'shon), n. A subordinate distinction. Sir M. Hale.

subdistrict (sub-dis'trikt), n. A part or division of a district.

subditious (sub-di-tish'us), a. [L. subditi-tus, subditi-tus, substituted, suppositions, < subdi-, put or set under, < sub, under, + dare*, put.] Put secretly in the place of something else; foisted in. Imp. Dict. [Rare.]

subdiversify (sub-di-ver'si-fi), v. t. To diversify again what is already diversified. Sir M. Hale. [Rare.]

subdivide (sub-di-vīd'), v.: pret. and pp. subdivided, ppr. subdividing. [= Sp. Pg. subdividir = It. suddividere, < LL. subdividere, subdivide, < L. sub, under, + dividere, divide; see divide.] I. trans. To redivide after a first division.

The progenies of Cham and Japhet swarmed into colonies, and those colonies were subdivided into many others. Dryden.

II. intrans. 1. To separate into subdivisions.

Amongst some men a sect is sufficiently thought to be reformed if it subdivides and breaks into little fractions, or changes its own opinions. Jer. Taylor, Works, VI. 125.

2. To become separated. [Rare.]

When Brutus and Cassius were overthrown, then soon after Antonius and Octavius broke and subdivided. Bacon, Faction (ed. 1887).

subdivisible (sub-di-viz'i-bl), a. Susceptible of subdivision.

subdivision (sub-di-vizh'on), n. [= F. subdivi-sion = Sp. Pg. subdivisión, < LL. subdivisio(n)-is, < subdividere, subdivide; see subdivide.] 1. The act of redividing, or separating into smaller parts.

When any of the parts of an idea are yet farther divided in order to a clear explication of the whole, this is called a subdivision. Watts, Logic, I. vi. § 8.

2. A minor division; a part of a part; specifically, in zoöl. and bot., a minor division of a group; a subsection; as, subdivisions of a genus.

In the Decimal Table the subdivisions of the Cubit, viz. the Span, Palm, and Digit, are deduced . . . from the shorter Cubit. Arbuthnot, Ancient Coins, p. 73.

subdivisional (sub-di-vizh'on-al), a. [< subdivi-sion + -al.] Of or pertaining to subdivision or a subdivision; as, a subdivisional name. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLV. ii. 62.

subdivisive (sub-di-vi'siv), a. [< LL. subdivisi-vus, < subdividere, subdivide; see subdivide.] Arising from subdivision.

When a whole is divided into parts, these parts may, either all or some, be themselves still connected multiplicities; and, if these are again divided, there results a subdivision the several parts of which are called the subdivisive members. Sir W. Hamilton, Logic, Lect. XXV.

subdolicocephalic (sub-dol'i-kō-sef'a-lik or -se-fal'ik), a. In cranium, having a cephalic index ranging between 75.01 and 77.77 in Broca's classification.

subdolous (sub-dō-lus), a. [< LL. subdolosus, < L. subdolos, somewhat crafty or deceitful, < sub, under, + dolus, artifice, guile; see dole.] Somewhat crafty; sly; cunning; artful; deceitful. Howell, Letters, I. vi. 14.

subdolosly (sub-dō-lus-li), adv. In a subdolos manner; slyly; artfully. Evelyn, To Pepys, Dec. 5, 1681.

subdulousness (sub-dō-lus-nes), n. The state of being subdulous. Baker, Chronicles, p. 382.

subdominant (sub-dom'i-nant), n. In music, the tone next below the dominant in a scale; the fourth, as D in the scale of A; also used adjectively. See diagram under circle.

subdorsal (sub-dōr'sal), a. In entom., situated on the side of the upper or dorsal surface of the body; as, subdorsal striae.

subdouble (sub-dū'b'l), a. Being in the ratio of 1 to 2.

subduable (sub-dū'a-bl), a. [< subduc + -able.] Capable of being subdued; conquerable. Imp. Dict.

subdual (sub-dū'al), n. [< subduc + -al.] The act of subduing. Warburton, Works (ed. Hurd), VII. 329.

subduce (sub-dūs'), v. t.: pret. and pp. subduced, ppr. subducing. [< L. subducere, pp. subductus, draw from under, lift up, haul up, take away, < sub, under, + ducere, lead, bring; see duct.] [< subduct, subduc.] 1. To withdraw; take away; draw or lift up.

It shall be expedient for such as intend to exercise prayer . . . to subduce and convey themselves from the company of the worldly people. Bacon, Early Works, p. 130.

2. To subtract arithmetically.

If, out of that supposed infinite multitude of antecedent generation, we should . . . subduce ten, . . . the residue must needs be less by ten than it was before that subtraction. Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 10.

subduct (sub-duk't'), v. t. [< L. subductus, pp. of subducere, draw from under, take away; see subduce.] Same as subduce, 1.

He . . . established himself upon the rug, . . . subducting his coat-tails one under each arm. Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 32.

subduction (sub-duk'shon), n. [< L. subductio(n)-is, a hauling ashore (of a ship), a taking away, < subducere, pp. subductus, haul up, take away; see subduce.] 1. The act of subducting, taking away, or withdrawing. Sp. Hall, Occasional Meditations, § 66.—2. Arithmetical subtraction. Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 10.

subdue (sub-dū'), v. t.: pret. and pp. subdued, ppr. subduing. [< ME. subduen, earlier soduen, sodewen, sudewen, < OF. souduir, lead away, seduce, prob. also subduc, < L. subducere, draw from under, lift up, take away, remove; see subduce, subduct.] 1. To conquer and bring into permanent subjection; reduce under dominion.

John of Gannt,
Which did subdue the greatest part of Spain.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., iii. 3. 82.

Rome learning arts from Greece whom she subdued.
Pope, Prolog. to Addison's Cato, l. 40.

2. To overpower by superior force; gain the victory over; bring under; vanquish; crush.

Tugg'd for life, and was by strength subdued
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 2. 173.

Lay hold upon him; if he do resist,
Subdue him at his peril. Shak., Othello, I. 2. 81.
Think of thy woman's nature, subdued in hopeless thrall.
Waltter, Cassandra Southwick.

3. To prevail over by some mild or softening influence; influence by association; assimilate; overcome, as by kindness, persuasion, entreaty, or other mild means; gain complete sway over; melt.

My nature is subdued
To what it works in, like the dyer's hand.
Shak., Sonnets, exi.

Therein enjoy'd were worthy to subdue
The soul of man. Milton, P. L., viii. 584.
Clasp hands and that petitionary grace
Of sweet seventeen subdued me ere she spoke.
Tennyson, The Brook.

4. To bring down; reduce.

Nothing could have subdued nature
To such a lowliness but his unkind daughters.
Shak., Learn, iii. 4. 72.

5. To tone down; soften; make less striking or harsh, as in sound, illumination, or color; in this sense generally in the past participle; as, subdued colors; a subdued light.

The voices of the dispirited fell, and the conversation was carried on thenceforth in a more subdued tone.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 17.

6. To improve by cultivation; make mellow; break, as land.

In proportion as the soil is brought into cultivation, or subdued, to use the local phrase, the consumers will become more numerous, and their means more extensive.
L. Hall, Travels in N. A., I. 86.

= Syn. 1 and 2. Vanquish, Subjugate, etc. (see conquer), crush, quell.—3. To soften.

subdue (sub-dū'), n. [ME. < subduc, v.] Subjugation; conquest. Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 5.

subduement (sub-dū'ment), n. [< subduc + -ment.] Subdual; conquest. Shak., T. and C., iv. 5. 187.

subduer (sub-dū'ēr), n. [< subduc + -er.] One who or that which subdues; one who conquers and brings into subjection; a conqueror; a tamer.

subdulcid (sub-dul'sid), a. [< L. subdulcis, sweetish (< sub, under, + dulcis, sweet), + -id.] Somewhat sweet; sweetish. Evelyn, Acetaria (ed. 1706), p. 154. [Rare.]

subduple (sub-dū-pl), a. [< L. sub, under, + duplus, double.] Having the ratio of 1 to 2.—Subduple ratio, in math. See duple.

subduplicate (sub-dū'pli-kāt), n. In math., expressed by the square root; as, the subduplicate ratio of two quantities—that is, the ratio of their square roots. Thus, the subduplicate ratio of a to b is the ratio of \sqrt{a} to \sqrt{b} , or it is the ratio whose duplicate is that of a to b.

subdural (sub-dū'rāl), a. Situated beneath the dura mater, between the dura mater and the arachnoid.—Subdural space, the interval between the dura mater and the arachnoid, formerly called the cavity of the arachnoid, when the latter membrane was supposed to be reflected continuously from the outer surface of the pia mater to the inner surface of the dura mater.

subectodermal (sub-ek-tō-dēr'māl), a. Situated underneath the ectoderm. Jour. Micros. Sci., XXVIII. 381.

subedit (sub-ed'it), v. t. To edit under the supervision of another. Thackeray, Philip, xlii.

subeditor (sub-ed'it-ēr), n. An assistant or subordinate editor; one who subedits.

subeditorial (sub-ed-i-tō'ri-āl), a. Of or pertaining to a subeditor. Athenaeum, No. 3238, p. 653.

subeditorship (sub-ed'it-ēr-ship), n. [< subedit + -ship.] The office or charge of a subeditor. Thackeray, Philip, xxx.

subelaphine (sub-el'a-fin), a. Resembling the red-deer, Cervus elaphus, as in the structure of the antlers, but having the brow-line simple, not reduplicated, as in the genera Dama and Pseudaxis; correlated with claphine.

subelliptic (sub-e-lip'tik), a. Somewhat elongate-ovate; between ovate and elliptic or oblong and elliptic.

subelliptical (sub-e-lip'ti-kāl), n. Same as subelliptic.

subemarginate (sub-ē-mār'ji-nāt), a. Slightly emarginate.

subendocardial (sub-en-dō-kār'di-āl), a. Lying or occurring beneath the endocardium.—Subendocardial tissue, the substance of the heart immediately underneath the endocardium.

subendothelial (sub-en-dō-thē'li-āl), a. Lying or occurring beneath the endothelium.

subentitle (sub-en-tī'tl), v. t. To give a subordinate title to. The Academy, Jan. 4, 1890, p. 7.

subepidermal (sub-ep-i-dēr'māl), a. Lying or occurring beneath the epidermis, in any sense.

subepithelial (sub-ep-i-thē'li-āl), a. Lying or occurring beneath the epithelium.—Subepithelial endothelium, Debove's name for an almost continuous layer of connective-tissue cells between the mucous membrane and the epithelium of the bronchi, bladder, and intestine.—Subepithelial plexus. See plexus.

subequal (sub-ē'kwāl), a. 1. Nearly equal.—2. Related as unequal numbers of which no one is as large as the sum of the rest.

subequilateral (sub-ē-kwi-lat'ē-rāl), a. Nearly equilateral, as a bivalve shell.

subequivale (sub-ē'kwi-valv), a. Nearly equivale, as a bivalve shell.

suber (sū'hēr), n. [NL. < L. suber, cork, the cork-oak.] In bot., same as cork, 1, 3.

suberate (sū'be-rāt), n. [< suber + -ate.] A salt ($C_6H_{12}M_2O_4$) of suberic acid.

suberect (sub-ē-rekt'), a. Nearly erect.

suberuous (sū-bē'rē-us), a. [< L. subereus, of cork, pertaining to the cork-oak, < suber, cork, the cork-oak.] Corky; suberose; in entom., specifying a soft elastic substance, somewhat like cork, found in the mature galls of some cynipidous insects.

suberic (sū-ber'ik), a. [< L. suber, cork, the cork-oak, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to cork; suberous.—Suberic acid, $C_6H_{14}O_4$, a dibasic acid which forms small granular crystals very soluble in boiling water, in alcohol, and in ether; it fuses at about 200° F., and sublimes in acicular crystals. It is prepared by treating rasped cork with nitric acid. It is also produced when nitric acid acts on stearic, margaric, or oleic acid, and other fatty bodies.

suberiferous (sū-be-rif'ē-rus), a. [< suber (in) + L. ferre = E. bear.] In bot., bearing or producing suberin.

suberification (sū-be-rif-i-kā'shon), n. [< L. suber, cork, + -ficatio(n)-is, < facere, make.] In bot., same as suberization.

suberin, suberine (sū'be-rin), n. [< L. suber, cork, the cork-oak, + -in, -ine.] The cellular tissue of cork after the various soluble matters have been removed. It is allied to cellulose. See cork, 2.

suberization (sū'be-rī-zā'shon), n. [< suberize + -ation.] In bot., the transformation of a membrane or cell-wall into suberin or cork.

suberize (sū'be-rīz), v. t.: pret. and pp. suberized, ppr. suberizing. [< L. suber, cork, + -ize.] In bot., to render corky, as a cell-wall.

suberoded (sub-ē-rō'ded), a. Same as suberous, 1.

suberose (sub-ē-rōs'), a. [< L. sub, under, + erosus, pp. of erodere, gnaw off or away, consume; see erode.] In bot., slightly erose; appearing as if a little eaten or gnawed on the margin.

suberose, suberous (sū'be-rōs, -rus), a. [< L. suber, cork, the cork-oak, + -osus, -ous.] Same as suberous, suberic.

subesophageal, subesophageal (sub-ē-sō-faj'-ē-āl), a. Situated below or beneath the esophagus or gullet; in Arthropoda, specifying certain nervous ganglia which lie underneath (ventrad of) the esophagus. Also infra-esophageal.—Subesophageal ganglion. See ganglion.

subfactor (sub-fak'tor), n. An under factor or agent. Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, xli.

subfactorial (sub-fak-tō'-ri-āl), n. One of a series of numbers calculated as follows. Starting with 1, multiply it by 1 and subtract 1, getting 0, which is called subfactorial one; multiply this by 2 and add 1, getting 1, which is called subfactorial two; multiply this by 3 and subtract 1, getting 2, which is called subfactorial three; multiply this by 4 and add 1, getting 9, which is called subfactorial four. This is carried on indefinitely.

subfalcial (sub-fal'si-āl), a. Running along the under edge of the falx cerebri; as, "a subfalcial sinus." Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VIII, 121.

subfalciform (sub-fal'si-fōrm), a. Somewhat falciform. Günther.

subfamily (sub-fam'i-li), n. In zool., the first subdivision of a family, containing several genera or only one genus. A subfamily may be introduced formally between the genus and the family when there is no other subdivision. Then the only subfamily of a family is continuous with the higher group. Subfamilies are now regularly indicated by the termination -inae; as, family Felidae, subfamily Felineae. That subfamily which takes the name of the family with a different termination is usually regarded as the typical subdivision of the family.

subfascial (sub-fash'i-āl), a. Situated below any fascia.

subfebrile (sub-fē'bril), a. Somewhat but not decidedly febrile.

subfemorals (sub-fem-ō-rā'lis), n.; pl. subfemorales (-lēz). Same as subcarureus.

subfeu (sub-fū'), v. t. [< sub- + feu, after ML. subfeudare; see sub- and feud, feoff.] To make subfeudation of; said of a vassal who vests lands held by him as such in a subvassal.

It was . . . impossible to subfeu the burgh lands. Encyc. Brit., IV, 63.

subfeudation (sub-fū-dā'shōn), n. [< ML. subfeudatio (-n-), < subfeudare, subfeu: see subfeu.] Same as subinfeudation.

It seems most probable that this practice, which is called subfeudation or subinfeudation, began while the feud was only for life. Brougham.

subfeudatory (sub-fū-dā-tō-ri), n.; pl. subfeudatories (-riz). [< sub- + feudatory. Cf. ML. subfeudatarius.] An inferior tenant who held a feud from a feudatory of the crown or other superior.

subflavor (sub-flā'vor), n. A subordinate flavor; a secondary flavor.

subflavous (sub-flā'vus), a. [< L. sub, under, + flavus, yellow; see flavous.] Yellowish.—Subflavous ligament, a short ligament of yellow elastic tissue interposed between the laminae of the vertebrae.

subflora (sub-flō'rā), n. [< sub- + flora.] A more local flora included in a territorially broader one.

subfluvial (sub-flō'vi-āl), a. [< L. sub, under, + fluvius, stream; see fluvial.] Situated under a river or stream.

The sub-fluvial avenue [Thames tunnel]. Hauthorne, Our Old Home, p. 285.

subfoliar (sub-fō'li-ār), a. [< subfolium + -ar.] Having the character of a subfolium. B. G. Wilder.

subfolium (sub-fō'li-um), n.; pl. subfolia (-i-ā). A small or secondary folium, as of the cerebellum. Ruck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VIII, 127.

subform (sub-fōrm), n. A secondary form. Jour. Micros. Sci., XXX, 195.

subfornical (sub-fōr'ni-kāl), a. Situated beneath the fornix of the brain.

subfossil (sub-fos'il), a. Partly fossilized; imperfectly petrified.

subfossilized (sub-fos'il-izd), a. Same as subfossil.

subfossorial (sub-fō-sō'-ri-āl), a. In entom., adapted in some measure for digging; said of the legs when they approach the fossorial type.

subfrontal (sub-fron'tāl), a. Situated under the front, face, or forehead; subterminal in front.—Subfrontal area, of Limulus, a smooth flattened space on the ventral surface of the cephalic shield anteriorly. See Limulus (with cut).—Subfrontal fold, of trilobites, an inferior inflection of the limb or marginal area of the cephalic shield.

subfulcrum (sub-fūl'krum), n.; pl. subfulcra (-krā). In entom., a rarely differentiated labial sclerite between the mentum and the palpiger [the latter in some systems being called the fulcrum]. It occurs in certain carabid and scarabaeid larvae.

subfumigation (sub-fū-mi-gā'shōn), n. Same as subfumigation.

subfusc, a. See subfusc.

subfuscous (sub-fus'kus), a. [< L. subfuscus; see subfusc.] Same as subfusc.

subfusiform (sub-fū'si-fōrm), a. More or less nearly fusiform or spindle-shaped.

subfusc, subfusc (sub-fus'k), a. [< L. subfuscus, suffusus, somewhat brown; see sub- and fuscous.] Dusky; moderately dark; brownish; tawny; lacking in color.

O'er whose quiescent walls
Arachne's unmolested care has drawn Curtains subfusc. Shenstone, Economy, iii.

The University statute requiring the wearing only of black or subfusc clothing. Dickens, Dict. of Oxford, p. 65.

subgalea (sub-gā'le-ā), n.; pl. subgaleae (-ē). [< NL. < L. sub, under, + galea.] One of the sclerites of the typical maxilla of insects. It usually articulates with the stipes and bears the galea. In many beetles it is united with the lacinia. See cut under galea.

subganoid (sub-gan'oid), a. Having a somewhat ganoid character; as, a subganoid scale.

subgelatinous (sub-jē-lat'i-nus), a. Imperfectly or partially gelatinous.

subgenera, n. Plural of subgenus.

subgeneric (sub-jē-ner'ik), a. Of or pertaining to a subgenus; having the rank, grade, or value of a subgenus.

subgeneric (sub-jē-ner'i-kāl), a. Same as subgeneric.

subgenerically (sub-jē-ner'i-kāl-i), adv. So as to be subgeneric; as a subgenus.

subgeniculate (sub-jē-nik'ū-lāt), a. Imperfectly geniculate or elbowed.

subgenital (sub-jēn'i-tāl), a. Situated beneath the genitalia; specifically noting certain pits or pouches of jellyfishes, as the rhizostomous or monostomous discomedusans.

subgenus (sub-jē'nus), n.; pl. subgenera (-jēn'-ē-rā). [< NL. < L. sub, under, + genus, kind; see genus.] A subordinate genus; a section or subdivision of a genus higher than a species. Since there is no fixed definition of a genus, there can be none of a subgenus; and thousands of groups in zoology formerly regarded as subgenera, or disregarded entirely, are now named and held to be genera. Though there is theoretically or technically a difference, it is ignored in practice; since a name, whether given as that of a genus or of a subgenus, is a generic name. The case is somewhat different in practice from that of the names of families and subfamilies, whose difference in termination preserves a formal distinction, and from that of the names of all supergeneric groups, because none of these enter into the technical binomial designation of a given animal or plant. Thus, the name Lynx may have been given to a subdivision of the genus Felis, and be thus a subgeneric name; but a cat of this kind, as the bay lynx, would be known by the alternative names Felis rufus and Lynx rufus, according to the difference of expert opinion in the case; or, as a compromise, the subgeneric term would be formally introduced in parentheses between the generic and the specific name, as Felis (Lynx) rufus. In botany a subgenus is a section of a genus so strongly marked as to have plausible claims to be itself an independent genus.

subgeti, a. and n. A Middle English form of subject.

subglabrous (sub-glā'brus), a. In entom., almost devoid of hairs or other like covering.

subglacial (sub-glā'shial), a. Situated or occurring beneath or under a glacier; as, a subglacial stream.

subglenoid (sub-glē'noid), a. Lying or occurring immediately below the glenoid fossa.

subglobose (sub-glō'bōs), a. Nearly globose; subpherical; spheroidal.

subglobular (sub-glob'ū-lār), a. Nearly globular.

subglobulose (sub-glob'ū-lōs), a. Somewhat globulose.

subglossal (sub-glos'al), a. Same as hypoglossal or sublingual.

subglottic (sub-glot'ik), a. Situated under the glottis, or beneath the true vocal cords of the larynx.

subglumaceous (sub-glō-mā'shius), a. Somewhat glumaceous.

subgrade (sub-grād), n. A grade of the second rank in zoological classification; a prime division of a grade; used like subclass, suborder, etc. See grade, 3.

Subgrallatores (sub-gral-ā-tō'rēz), n. pl. [< NL. < L. sub, under, + NL. Grallatores, q. v.] In ornith., in Sundevall's system, a cohort of Gallinæ, composed of the genera Thinocornis, Attagis, and Chionis. [Not in use.]

subgrallatorial (sub-gral-ā-tō'-ri-āl), a. Imperfectly grallatorial; exhibiting imperfectly the characters of the grallatorial birds.

subgranular (sub-gran'ū-lār), a. Somewhat granular.

subgroup (sub-grōp), n. 1. Any subordinate group in classification; a subdivision of a group; especially, a division the name of which begins with sub-, as subfamily or subgenus.—2. A mathematical group forming part of another group.

subgular (sub-gū-lār), a. Situated under the throat, or on the under side of the throat; sub-jugular.

subhastation (sub-has-tā'shōn), n. [= F. subhastation = Sp. subhastacion = It. subhastazione, < LL. subhastatio (-n-), a sale by public auction, < subhastare, pp. subhastatus, sell at public auction, lit. 'bring under the spear' (in allusion to the Roman practice of planting a spear on the spot where a public sale was to take place). < L. sub, under, + hasta, a spear, a lance.] A public sale of property to the highest bidder; a sale by auction. Bp. Burnet, Letters from Switzerland, p. 9.

subhead (sub'hed), n. A subordinate head or title; a subdivision of a heading. See head, 13.

subheading (sub'hed-ing), n. Same as subhead.

subhepatic (sub-hē-pat'ik), a. In anat. and zool.: (a) Of doubtful or disputed hepatic character, as a glandular tissue of some invertebrates, which resembles that of the liver. (b) Lying under the liver, on the ventral side of hepatic lobules; sublobular, as ramifications of the portal vein in the liver. (c) Situated beneath the hepatic region; specifically applied to an anterolateral division of the ventral surface of the carapace in brachyurous crustaceans. See Brachyura (with cut).

subhexagonal (sub-hek-sag'ō-nal), a. Six-sided, but not forming a regular hexagon.

Sub-Himalayan (sub-him-ā-lā-yān), a. Related to or forming the whole or a part of the Sub-Himalayas, the designation adopted by the Geological Survey of India for a fringe or belt of hills extending along the southern edge of the Himalayan chain almost uninterruptedly for a distance of 1,500 miles, and composed of Tertiary rocks.

By abrupt difference of elevation and by contour the Sub-Himalayan hills are everywhere easily distinguishable from the much higher mountains to the north of them. Geol. of India, ii, 521.

Sub-Himalayan system, in geol., the name adopted by the Geological Survey of India for the system of rocks forming the Sub-Himalayan division of the Himalayas. It is divided into two series—the Sivalik (subdivided into three subgroups, the Upper, Middle, and Lower or Nahai) and the Sirmuir (also with three subgroups, the Upper or Kasauli, the Middle or Bagshai, and the Lower or Subathu). See Sivalik.

subhuman (sub-hū'mān), a. Under or beneath the human; next below the human.

Pretended superhuman birth and origin, . . . lives and characters more decidedly subhuman than those of common men. E. H. Sears, The Fourth Gospel, p. 230.

subhumeral (sub-hū'mē-rāl), a. Situated below the humerus.

subhumerate (sub-hū'mē-rāt), v. t. [< L. sub, under, + humerus, prop. umerus, shoulder, + -ate.] To take or bear on one's shoulders. Frltham, Resolves, i, 82.

subhyaloid (sub-hī'ā-loid), a. Situated beneath (on the attached side of) the hyaloid membrane of the eyeball.

subhymenial (sub-hī-mē'ni-āl), a. In bot., lying under or just below the hymenium. Subhymenial layer, a stratum of hyphal tissue under the hymenium in some fungi; the hypothecium, and sometimes another layer still further below. See cuts under apothecium and ascus.

subhyoid (sub-hī'oid), a. 1. Situated below the hyoid bone, as of man.—2. Coming next in order after the hyoid arch before backward; specifically, noting the fourth visceral arch of the vertebrate embryo, or first branchial arch proper.

subhyoidean (sub-hī-oi'dē-ān), a. Same as subhyoid.

subicteric (sub-ik-ter'ik), a. Somewhat but not distinctly icteric.

subiculum (sū-bik'ū-lum), n. [< NL. dim. of subex (subic-), in pl. subices, a layer, < subicere, throw under; see subject.] 1. The uncus.—2. In bot., the modified tissue of the host penetrated by the mycelium of a parasite. Borchg.

subiliac (sub-il'i-ak), a. 1. Pertaining to the subilium.—2. Situated below the ilium.

subilium (sub'il-i-um), n.; pl. subilia (-i-ā). [< NL. < L. sub, under, + NL. ilium, q. v.] An inferior section of the ilium, supposed to correspond to the subscapula.

subimaginal (sub-i-maj'i-nal), a. [< subimago (-imago-) + -al.] Having the character of a subimago; not quite perfect or imaginal, as an insect; pseudimaginal.

subimaginary (sub-i-maj'i-nā-ri), a. Imaginary in a reduced sense.—Subimaginary transformation, a linear transformation defined by equations between two sets of variables, which equations are imaginary, but the transformation being such that a real linear function may in that way be transformed into a real function.

subimago (sub'i-mā gō), n.; pl. subimagos or subimagines (sub'i-mā gōz or -maj' i-nēz). [N.L., < L. sub, under, + imago, image; see imago.] An imperfect or incompletely winged stage in certain pseudoneuropterous and neuropterous insects, succeeding the pupa, and preceding the imago. Also called pseudimago. The insect in this stage is active, and resembles the imago, but has to shed another skin. This stage occurs as a rule in the Ephemeroidea of the Pseudoneuroptera, and Riley has recorded it in Chrysopa of the Neuroptera.

subimpressed (sub-im-press'), a. In entom., slightly impressed; having indistinct impressions.

subincomplete (sub-in-kom-plēt'), a. In entom., noting that metamorphosis of an insect in which the active larva and pupa resemble the imago, the pupa having rudimentary wings, as in the grasshoppers.

subincusation (sub-in-kū-zā'shon), n. [< L. sub, under, + incusatio(n)-, accusation, < incusare, accuse, bring a complaint against, < in, on, against, + causare, a cause, suit; see cause. Cf. accuse.] An implied charge or accusation.

But all this cannot deliver thee [Mary] from the just blame of this bold subincusation: Lord, dost thou not care? Ep. Hall, Contemplations, Mary and Martha.

subindicate (sub-in'di-kāt), v. t. To indicate secondarily; indicate in a less degree.

subindication (sub-in-di-kā'shon), n. The act of indicating secondarily; a slight indication. Barrow.

subindicative (sub-in-dik'ā-tiv), a. Partially or secondarily indicative. Lamb, Some of the Old Actors.

subindividual (sub-in-di-vid'ū-al), n. A division of that which is individual.

An individual cannot branch itself into subindividuals. Milton, On Def. of Humbl. Remonst., § 13.

subinduce (sub-in-dūs'), v. t. To insinuate; suggest; offer or bring into consideration imperfectly or indirectly. Sir W. Dering, Speeches in Parliament, p. 114.

subinfer (sub-in-fēr'), v. t. To infer or deduce from an inference already made. Ep. Hall, Resol. for Religion.

subinfundation (sub-in-fū-dā'shon), n. [< OF. subinfundation, < L. sub, under, + M.L. infundatio(n)-, infundation; see infundation.] 1. The process, in feudal tenure, where the stipendiary or feudatory, considering himself as substantially the owner, began to imitate the example of his sovereign by carving out portions of the benefice or feud, to be held of himself by some other person, on terms and conditions similar to those of the original grant: a continued chain of successive dependencies was thus established, connecting each stipendiary, or vassal as he was termed, with his immediate superior or lord. H. Stephen. See Statute of Quia Emptores, under statute.

The widow is immediate tenant to the heir, by a kind of subinfundation or under tenancy. Blackstone, Com., II. viii.

2. The fief or tenancy thus established.

These smaller fiefs were called subinfundations, and were, in fact, mere miniatures of the larger fiefs. Stille, Stud. Med. Hist., p. 137.

Also subinfundation.

subinfudatory (sub-in-fū-dā-tō-ri), n.; pl. subinfudatories (-riz). One who holds by subinfundation.

At the time of the Conquest the manor was granted to Walter d'Elincourt, and in the 12th century it was divided among the three daughters of his subinfudatory vassalus. Encyc. Brit., XX. 298.

subinflammation (sub-in-flā-mā'shon), n. Incipient or undeveloped inflammation.

subinflammatory (sub-in-flām'ā-tō-ri), a. Pertaining to or of the nature of a slight and indistinct degree of inflammation.

subingression (sub-in-gresh'on), n. The penetration by one body of the substance of another body.

An eminent naturalist hath taught that, when the air is sucked out of a body, the violence wherewith it is wont to rush into it again proceeds mainly from this, that the pressure of the ambient air is strengthened upon the accession of the air sucked out, which, to make itself room, forceth the neighboring air to a violent subingression of its parts. Boyle, New Experiments Touching the Spring of the Air, [Exp. iii.]

subinspector (sub'in-spek'tor), n. A subordinate or assistant inspector.

subinspectorship (sub'in-spek-tor-ship), n. [< subinspector + -ship.] The office or jurisdiction of a subinspector.

subintestinal (sub-in-tes'ti-nal), n. Situated beneath the intestine.

subintroduce (sub-in-trō-dūs'), v. t. To introduce in a subordinate or secondary manner.

Although presbyters join not in the consecration of a bishop, yet of a presbyter they do; but this is only by a positive subintroduced constitution, first made in a provincial of Africa. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 198.

subinvariant (sub-in-vā'ri-ant), n. Any rational integral function, ϕ , of the letters a, b, c, \dots , which satisfies the partial differential equation $(aD_a + bD_b + cD_c + \dots)\phi = 0$.

subinvolute (sub-in-vō-lū-ted), a. Exhibiting incomplete involution. Medical News, L. 394.

subitaneous (sub-i-tā'nē-us), a. [< L. subitaneus, sudden, < subitus, sudden, unexpected; see sudden.] Sudden; hasty.

subitaneousness (sub-i-tā'nē-us-nes), n. Suddenness; hastiness.

subitany (sub-i-tā-ni), a. [< L. subitaneus, sudden; see subitaneous.] Sudden; hasty.

subito (sō'bi-tō), adv. [It., < L. subito, suddenly, abl. sing. neut. of subitus, sudden; see subitaneous, sudden.] In music, suddenly; quickly; as, colti subito (V. S.). turn (the leaf) quickly.

subj. An abbreviation of subjunctive.

subjacency (sub-jā'sen-si), n. [< subjacent(t) + -cy.] The state of being subjacent.

subjacent (sub-jā'sent), a. and n. [= F. subjacent = Pg. subjacente, < L. subjacere(-t)-s, pp. of subjacere, lie under or near or adjoin anything, < sub, under, + jacere, lie; see juvent. Cf. adjacent.] 1. a. 1. Lying under or below: in geol., applied to rocks, beds, or strata, considered with reference to their position beneath other overlying formations.—2. Being in a lower situation, though not necessarily directly beneath.

Between some breaches of the clouds we could see land-skip and villages of the subjacent country. Evlyn, Diary, Nov. 2, 1644.

3. In alg., following below the line of the main characters: as, a subjacent letter, as the n in m_n.

II. n. In logic, the converting proposition or consequent of a conversion.

subject (sub'jekt), a. and n. [Now altered to suit the orig. L. form; < *ME. subget, suget, suget, suget, < OF. suget, suget, suget, suget, suget, later subject, F. sujet = Sp. sujeto, subjecto = Pg. sujeito = It. soggetto, soggetto, subject, as a noun (= G. subjekt), a subject (person or thing), < L. subiectus, lying under or near, adjacent, also subject, exposed, as a noun, subjectus, m., a subject, an inferior, subjectum, neut., the subject of a proposition, prop. pp. of subjicere, subicere, pp. subjicere, throw, lay, place, or bind under, subject, < sub, under, + jacere, throw; see jet. Cf. subjacent. Cf. object, object, project.] I. a. 1. Placed or situated under or beneath.*

Long he them bore above the subject plain, ie. Spenser, F. Q., I. xi. 19.

2. Being under the power or dominion of another.

For there nys God in heaven or helle, iwis, But he hath been right soget unto Love. Court of Love, l. 93.

Though in name an independent kingdom, she [Scotland] was during more than a century really treated, in many respects, as a subject province.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., i.

3. Exposed; liable, from extraneous or inherent causes; prone: with to: as, a country subject to extreme heat or cold; a person subject to attacks of fever.

Most subject is the fattest soil to weeds. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 4. 54.

My Lord you are a great Prince, and all Eyes are upon your Actions; this makes you more subject to Envy. Harold, Letters, I. iv. 18.

A little knowledge is subject to make men headstrong, insolent, and intractable. Ep. Sprat, Hist. Royal Soc., p. 429.

Hence—4. Exposed or liable, as to what may confirm or modify: with for: as, subject to your approval; subject to correction.—5. Submissive; obedient. Tit. iii. 1.

No man was ever bidd be subject to the Church of Corinth, Rome, or Asia, but to the Church without addition, as it held faithful to the rules of Scripture. Milton, Eikonoklastes, xxvii.

Unless Love held them subject to the Will That gave them being, they would cease to be. Bryant, Order of Nature.

—Syn. 2. Subordinate, subservient, inferior.—3. Appt. Likely, etc. See apt.

II. n. 1. One who is placed under the authority, dominion, or controlling influence of another; specifically, one who owes allegiance to a sovereign and is governed by his laws; one who lives under the protection of, and owes allegiance to, a government.

And he leet make an Ymage in the lyknesse of his Fadre, and constryned alle his Subjettes for to worshipspe it. Maunder, Travels, p. 41.

Tell his majesty I am a subject, and I do confess I serve a gracious prince. Fletcher (and another), Noble Gentleman, II. 1.

2. A person or thing regarded as the recipient of certain treatment; one who or that which is exposed or liable to something specified.

Alack, alack, that heaven should practise stratagems Upon so soft a subject as myself! Shak., R. and J., iii. 5. 212.

There is not a fairer subject for contempt and ridicule than a knave become the dupe of his own art. Sheridan, The Duenna, iii. 7.

The town bear [of Congleton] having died, it was ordered that certain monies . . . should be placed at the disposal of the bearward, to enable him to provide a new subject. Municip. Corp. Report, 1835, p. 2652.

Specifically—(a) A dead body used for dissection. (b) One who is peculiarly sensitive to psychological experimentation; a sensitive.

The monotonous ticking of a watch held to the ear will throw the nervous system of a sensitive subject into an abnormal state. Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 251.

3. One who or that which is the cause or occasion of something.

I am the unhappy subject of these quarrels. Shak., M. of V., v. 1. 238.

Hear her, ye noble Romans! 'Tis a woman; A subject not for swords, but pity. Fletcher, Valentinian, v. 8.

4. That on which any mental operation is performed; that which is thought, spoken, or treated of: as, a subject of discussion or negotiation; a subject for a sermon or a song; the subject of a story.

The matter or subject of Poesie . . . to myne intent is what soever witty and delicate conceit of man meet or worthy to be put in written verse, for any necessary use of the present time, or good instruction of the posteritie. Pattenbam, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 18.

O, sure I am, the wits of former days To subjects worse have given admiring praise. Shak., Sonnets, lix.

This subject for heroic song Pleased me. Milton, P. L., ix. 25.

But this, no more the subject of debate, Is past, forgotten, and resign'd to fate. Pope, Iliad, xix. 67.

5. In gram., that of which anything is affirmed; the nominative of a verb, without or with modifiers; the member or part of a sentence signifying that of which predication is made. A subject may be simple or compound; it may be a noun, or anything used with the value of a noun, whether word or phrase or clause: thus, that he has gone is true. A logical subject is one having the character of a subject according to the true meaning of the sentence; a grammatical subject is one having that character formally only: thus, in it is good to be here, it is the grammatical and to be here is the logical subject.

6. In logic, that term of a proposition of which the other is affirmed or denied. Thus, in the proposition "Plato was a philosopher," Plato is the logical subject, philosopher being its predicate, or that which is affirmed of the subject. Also, in the proposition "No man living on earth can be completely happy," man living on earth is the subject, and completely happy is the predicate, or that which is denied of the subject.

7. In metaph.: (a) A real thing to which given characters relate and in which they are said to inhere.

That which manifests its qualities—in other words, that in which the appearing causes inhere, that to which they belong—is called their subject, or substance, or substratum. Sir W. Hamilton, Metaphysics, viii.

(b) In Kantian and modern philosophy, the self or ego to which in all thought all mental representations are attributed (according to Kant); also, a real (hypothetical) thing in which mental phenomena are supposed to inhere. The word is commonly used by those psychologists who teach that the immediate consciousness of self (the subject) is an aspect or inseparable accompaniment of an immediate perception of an external object. The doctrine is that perception involves a sense of action and reaction (self and not-self). To this is often joined another proposition, that there is no mode of consciousness in which the opposition of subject and object does not appear. [Expressions very close to this meaning are to be found in pre-Kantian writers (see Leibnitz, Remarques sur le livre de M. King, § 20), but the word is in such passages used relatively, as in def. 6.]

In the first syllogism of transcendental psychology reason imposes upon us an apparent knowledge only, by representing the constant logical subject of thought as the knowledge of the real subject in which that knowledge inheres. Of that subject, however, we have not, and cannot have, the slightest knowledge, because consciousness is that which alone changes representations into thoughts, and in which, therefore, as the transcendental subject, all our perceptions must be found. Beside this logical meaning of the I, we have no knowledge of the subject in itself which forms the substratum and foundation of it and of all our thoughts.

Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Muller (Century ed.), II, 305.

The particular modes in which I now feel, desire, and think arise out of the modes in which I have previously done so; but the common characteristic of all these has been that in them a subject was conscious of itself as its own object, and thus self-determined.

T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 102.

The subject can be conscious of itself only in relation to an object which it at once excludes and determines.

E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 34, note.

8. In music: (a) In general, the theme or melodic phrase on which a work or movement is based, consisting of few or many tones variously combined and treated; a motive. When two or more principal subjects are used, they are often known as first, second, etc. (b) In contrapuntal works, the theme given out at the beginning, to which (in fugue and canon) the answer responds, and with which the counter-subject is combined which is taken as the basis for thematic development, for imitation, etc. In a fugue, the subject is also called antecedent, dur, proposita, etc.; in a canon, guida; and in free contrapuntal music, cantus firmus or canto fermo.

9. In the fine arts, the plan or general view chosen by an artist; the design of a composition or picture; the scheme or idea of a work of art; as, a historical subject; a genre subject; a marine subject; a pastoral subject.—10. In decorative art, a pictorial representation of human figures or animals; a picture representing action and incident.

Vases painted with subjects after Watteau.

Soc. Arts Report, Exh. 1-67.

Diminished subject. See diminished.—First subject. See first.—Intervening subject. See intervene.—Inversion of subjects. See inversion.—Mixed subjects of property. See mixed.—Subject of inhesion, a thing in which characters inhere.—Subject of predication, the subject of a proposition.—Subject of relation, that one of the correlates to which the others are referred as secondary; the relate.—To be in a subject, to be related to anything somewhat as a predicate is related to its subject; to exist by virtue of that subject of which the attribute which is in the subject does not form a part.—Syn. 4. Subject, Theme, Topic, Point, Thesis. The first three of these words are often popularly used as exactly synonymous. Daniel Webster puts within a few lines of each other the two following sentences: [If an American Thucydides should arise,] "may his theme not be a Peloponnesian war," and [American history] "will furnish no topic for a Gibbon." Yet, strictly in rhetoric, and more often in general use, subject is the broad word for anything written or spoken about, while theme is the word for the exact and generally narrower statement of the subject. A topic is a still narrower subject; there may be several interesting topics suggested under a single subject. A point is by its primary meaning the smallest possible subdivision under a subject. Thesis is a technical word for a subject which takes the form of an exact proposition or assertion which is to be proved; as, Luther fastened his ninety-five theses to the church-door. The paper in which the proof of a thesis is attempted is also called a thesis. A student's composition is often called a theme. The meaning of the other words is not extended to the written or spoken discourse. See proposition.

Or lawless passions in him, which he serves.
Milton, P. R., ii, 471.

If the vessels yield, it subjects the person to all the inconveniences of an erroneous circulation.

Arbuthnot.

3. To submit; make accountable, subservient, or the like; cause to undergo; expose, as in chemical or other operations: with to: as, to subject clay to a white heat.

Subjected to his service angel-wings.

Milton, P. L., ix, 155.

God is not bound to subject his ways of operation to the scrutiny of our thoughts.

Locke.

Church discipline [in Germany] was subjected to state approval; and a power of expelling rebellious clergy from the country was established.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 559.

No gas is "atomic" in the chemist's sense, except when subjected to the action of electricity, or, in the case of hydrogen, to a high temperature.

J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 144.

4. To bring under power, dominion, or sway; subdue; subordinate.

High lone permits the sunne to cast his beames,
And the moyst cloudes to drop downe plenteous streames,
Alike upon the just & reprobate;
Yet are not both subjected by one fate?

Times's Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 6.

Neither God nor the Lawes have subjected us to his will, nor sett his reason to be our sovran above Law.

Milton, Likonoklastes, xi.

II. † intrans. To be or become subject.

When men freely subject to any just as a new master.

T. Brooks, Works, II, 242.

subjectable (sub-jek'ta-bl), a. [< subject + -able.] To be subjected or submitted. [Rare.]

It was propounded to these fathers confessors as a thing not subjectable to their penitential judicature.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II, 106.

subjectdom (sub-jekt-dum), n. [< subject + -dom.] The state or condition of being a subject.

No clue to its nationality, except in the political sense of subjectdom, therefore is available.

Greenwell, British Barrows, p. 60s. (Encyc. Dict.)

subject (sub-jek'shon), n. [< ME. subjec-tion, subjection, subjeccion, < OF. Wordsworth, Excursion, iii.

3. In logic, the act of attaching a subject to a predicate; corresponding to predication.

subjective (sub-jek'tiv), a. [= F. subjectif = Sp. subjetivo = G. subjektiv, < L. subjectivus, of or pertaining to a subject, < subjectum, a subject; see subject, n.] 1. Relating to or of the nature of a subject, as opposed to an object. In the older writers subjective is nearly synonymous with real, and still more closely so with the common modern meaning of objective. By Kant, following some of his earlier contemporaries, the word was restricted to the subject of thought, or the ego. See objective.

Certainty, according to the schools, is distinguished into objective and subjective. Objective certainty is when the proposition is certainly true in itself, and subjective when we are certain of the truth of it. The one is in things, the other is in our minds.

Watts, Logic, II, ii, § 8.

The words subjective and objective are getting into general use now.

E. Fitzgibbon, Letter, Mar. 21, 1841 (in Lit. Remains, I, 71).

The megalized or semi-civilized man is wholly unable to think of the maniac's visions as subjective illusions.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 124.

All knowledge on its subjective side is belief.

J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 434.

2. In literature and art, noting a production characterized by the prominence given to the individuality of the author or artist; as, the subjective school of painting; also, relating to such individuality. The writings of Shelley and Byron are essentially subjective, while the novels of Scott are objective.

They [the Hiad and Odyssey] are so purely objective that they seem projected, as it were, into this visible diurnal sphere with hardly a subjective trace adhering to them, and are silent as the stars concerning their own genesis and mutual relation.

W. D. Howells.

I am disposed to consider the Sonnets from the Portuguese as . . . a portion of the finest subjective poetry in our literature.

Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 137.

3. Relating to a subject in a political sense: submissive; obedient. [A rare and irregular use.]

What eye can look, through clear love's spectacle,

On virtue's majesty that shines in beauty,

But, as to nature's divin's miracle,

Performs not to it all subjective duty?

Sir J. Davies, Witte's Pilgrimage, sig. D, 2. (Latham)

Which sully when they saw

Submit them to his sword. Dryden, Polyolbion, xl, 376.

Subjective certainty. See certainty. Subjective colors. Same as accidental colors (which see, under accidental). Subjective doubt, end, ens. See the noun.

Subjective idealism. Same as Fichtian idealism (which see, under idealism).—Subjective method, power, reason, etc. See the nouns.—Subjective part. See extension, 5.—Subjective perspective, a method of representation which looks right, though it is geometrically false. This method is, in fact, usually practised by painters who greatly exaggerate certain effects of perspective.

as if the picture were intended to be seen from a point of view much nearer than that usually chosen by the spectator, and are then obliged to modify certain consequences of this exaggeration.—Subjective sensation, a sensation which is not caused by an object outside of the body.—Subjective symptoms, in pathology, symptoms, as sensations, appreciable by the patient, but not discernible by another observer.

subjectively (sub-jek'tiv-li), adv. In a subjective manner; in relation to the subject; as existing in a subject or mind.

I do not see how we can successfully guard against the danger of considering as both objectively and subjectively evident things which, in fact, are only subjectively evident.

Micart, Nature and Thought, p. 5s.

subjectiveness (sub-jek'tiv-nes), n. The state of being subjective; subjectivity.

subjectivism (sub-jek'tiv-izm), n. [< subjective + -ism.] 1. The doctrine that we can immediately know only what is present to consciousness.

Those who adhere to this opinion either regard it as axiomatic, or fortify it by arguments analogous to those by which Zeno sought to prove that a particle can have only position, and not velocity, at any instant—arguments which appear, upon logical analysis, to beg the question. Those who oppose the opinion maintain that it would lead to the absurd corollary that there can be no cognition whatever, not even of a problematical or interrogatory kind, concerning anything but the immediate present.

The philosophical principle of subjectivism.

Chetwary, Hist. Philosophy (trans. by Morris), I.

2. The doctrine, sometimes termed relativism, that "man is the measure of things"—that is, that the truth is nothing but each man's settled opinion, there being no objective criterion of truth at all. This is an opinion held by some English philosophers as well as by Protagoras in antiquity. It is a modification of subjectivism in sense 1, above.

3. Same as subjectivity, 3.

subjectivist (sub-jek'tiv-ist), n. and a. [< subjective + -ist.] I. n. In metaph., one who holds the doctrine or doctrines of subjectivism.

II. a. Same as subjectivistic.—Subjectivist logic. See logic.

subjectivistic (sub-jek'tiv-ist'ik), a. [< subjective + -ic.] Pertaining to or characterized by subjectivism.

subjectivistically (sub-jek'tiv-ist'ik-ly), adv. With subjectivistic reasoning; from the point of view of subjectivism.

subjectivity (sub-jek'tiv-i-ti), n. [= F. subjectivité = G. subjektivität, < NL. subjecktivitas = L. subjectivus, subjective; see subject, v.] 1. The absence of objective reality; illusiveness; the character of arising within the mind, as, for example, the sensation of a color does.

We must, in the first place, remember that analysis and subjectivity on the one hand, and synthesis and objectivity on the other hand, go together in Kant's mind.

E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 413.

Belief in the subjectivity of time, space, and other forms of thought inevitably involves Agnosticism.

J. Martineau, Mind, XIII, 506.

2. The private, arbitrary, and limited element of self; that which is peculiar to an individual mind; as, the subjectivity of Byron or Shelley.

There are two ways of looking at subjectivity. We may understand by it, in the first place, only the natural and finite subjectivity, with its contingent and arbitrary content of particular interests and inclinations. . . . In this sense of subjectivity, we cannot help admitting the tranquil resignation of the ancients to destiny, and feeling that it is a much higher and worthier mood than that of the moderns, who obstinately pursue their subjective aims, and when they find themselves constrained to give up the hope of reaching them, console themselves with the prospect of a reward in some shape or other. But the term subjectivity is not to be confined merely to the bad and finite kind of it which is contradistinguished from the fact. In its truth subjectivity is immanent in the fact, and as a subjectivity this infinite is the very truth of the fact. . . . Christianity, we know, teaches that God wishes all men to be saved. That teaching declares that subjectivity has an infinite value.

Hegel, Henning's notes of his lectures, tr. in Wallace's Logic of Hegel, § 147.

It is surely subjectivity and interiority which are the notions latest acquired by the human mind.

W. James, Prin. of Psychology, II, 43.

subjectivize (sub-jek'ti-viz), v. [< subjective + -ize.] To render subjective; to bring into the perceptive mind.

subjectless (sub-jek'ti-less), a. [< subject + -less.] Having no subject or subjects.

The subject without the king can do nothing; the subjectless king can do something. Carlyle.

subject-matter (sub-jek't-mat'ēr), n. The subject or matter presented for consideration in some written or oral statement or discussion.

It [a catalogue] is disposed according to the Subject Matter of the books, as the Bibles and Expositors, Historians, Philosophers, &c. Lister, Journey to Paris, p. 107.

subjectness (sub-jek'ti-ness), n. The state or condition of being subject; subjection. [Rare.] subject-notion (sub-jek'ti-nō'shon), n. A concept or notion the subject of a judgment.

subject-object (sub-jek'ti-ob'jekt), n. The immediate object of cognition, or the thought itself, as distinguished from the object-object, or unknown real object. [In Kantian terminology, the Gegenstand, as distinguished from the Objekt.]

subjectship (sub-jek'ti-ship), n. [< subject + -ship.] The state of being subject or a subject. [Rare.]

The subjectship, being the very relation in which the creature stands to the Creator as his lawgiver, ruler, and judge. Candlish, The Fatherhood of God, I. 54.

subjecture (sub-jek'tūr), n. [< subject + -ure.] The state of being subject; subjection. [Rare.] subjee (sub'jē), n. [Hind. subzi, the larger leaves and capsules of the hemp-plant, also greenness, greens, < subza, greenness, verdure, the hemp-plant.] The larger leaves and capsules of the Indian hemp without the stalks. See blang.

subjectibility (sub-jis-i-bil'i-ti), n. [< ML. sub-jicibilis (-t-), < sub-jicibilis; see sub-jicible.] Capability of being a subject of predication.

subjectible (sub-jis'i-bl), a. [< ML. sub-jicibilis, subjectible, < L. sub-jicere, sub-jice, place under, subject; see subject.] 1. Capable of being subjected. [Rare.]

He [Jesus] was not a person subjectible to a command; it was enough that he understood the inclinations and designs of his Father's mercies. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 56.

2. Capable of being made the subject of something else as predicate.

subjoin (sub-join'), v. t. [< OF. subjoindre, < L. sub-jungere, add, annex, yoke, < sub, under, + jungere, join, yoke; see join.] To add at the end of, especially of something said or written; annex; append; as, to subjoin an argument or an illustration.

I shall subjoin, as a Corollary to the foregoing Remark, an admirable Observation out of Aristotle. Addison, Spectator, No. 273.

= Syn. To ally, attach.

subjoinder (sub-join'dēr), n. [< OF. subjoindre, subjoin, inf. used as a noun; see subjoin.] A remark following or subjoined to another; a rejoinder. [Rare.]

"I will never stand to be hissed," was the subjoinder of young Confidence. Laub, Ellistoniana.

subjoint (sub'join'), n. In zool., a subsidiary or secondary joint; one of the subdivisions, often very numerous, of the regular joints of an insect's or a crustacean's legs, antennae, etc. Thus, the fore legs of a pedipalp arachnid, or the antennae of a lobster, have numerous subjoints in the long, slender, lash-like part of the organ beyond the short and stout joints that are identified by name. See Phryganea. Also called subsegment.

sub-judice (sub-jō'di-sē), [L. sub, under; judice, abl. sing. of judex, judge; see judge.] Before the judge; under judicial consideration; not yet decided.

The relations of the people and the crown were then [reign of James I.] brought to issue, and, under shifting names, continued sub-judice from that time to 1688. De Quincy, Rhetoric.

subjugable (sub-jō-ga-bl), a. [*< L. as if sub-jugabilis, < sub-jugare, subjugate; see subjugate.] That may be subjugated; capable of being subdued or conquered.

An abundance of good, readily subjugable land awaiting the settler. Science, VII. 232.

subjugal (sub-jō'gal), a. [< L. sub, under, + E. jugal.] Situated below the jugal, malar, or zygomatic bone.

subjugate (sub-jō-gāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. subjugated, pp. subjugating. [< L. subjugatus, pp. of subjugare (> It. subjugare = Sp. subjugar, so-jugar = Pg. subjugar = F. subjuguer), bring under the yoke, subjugate, < sub, under, + jugum, yoke; see yoke.] 1. To bring under the yoke; subdue; conquer; compel to submit to the dominion or control of another; vanquish.

He subjugated a king, and called him his vassal. Baker

In a few months he [Cromwell] subjugated Ireland as Ireland had never been subjugated during the five centuries of slaughter which had elapsed since the landing of the first Norman settlers. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., i.

2. To make subservient; take or hold captive; bring under bondage, as the senses.

Mans sense captiv'de, his reason subjugate. Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 109.

I understood that unto such a torment The carnal malefactors were condemned Who reason subjugate to appetite. Longfellow, tr. of Dante's Inferno, v. 39.

= Syn. 1. Vanquish, Subdue, etc. See conquer.

subjugation (sub-jō-gā'shon), n. [= Sp. subjugación, < ML. subjugatio (-n-), < L. subjugare, subjugate; see subjugate.] The act of subjugating, or the state of being subjugated; subjection.

Her policy was military because her objects were power, ascendancy, and subjugation.

D. Webster, Speech at Plymouth, Dec. 22, 1820.

The subjugation of virgin soil, as we had occasion to notice, is a serious work. B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 348.

subjunction (sub-jungk'shon), n. [*< L. as if sub-junctio (-n-), < sub-jungere, add, subjoin; see subjoin.] The act of subjoining, or the state of being subjoined; also, something subjoined.

subjunctive (sub-jungk'tiv), a. and n. [= F. subjunctif = Sp. subjuntivo = Pg. subjunctivo = It. subjuntivo, < L. subjunctivus, serving to join, connecting, in gram., see modus, the subjunctive mode, < sub-jungere, pp. sub-junctus, add, join, subjoin; see subjoin.] 1. a. 1. Subjoined or added to something before said or written.

A few things more, subjunctive to the former, were thought meet to be castigated in preachers at that time. Ep. Hacket, Alp. Williams, p. 87. (Latham.)

2. In gram., noting that mode of the verb by which is expressed condition, hypothesis, or contingency, and which is generally used in a clause subjoined or subordinate to another clause or verb, and preceded by one of certain conjunctions, especially (in English) if or though; as in the sentence "if that be the case, then I am wrong." The subjunctive mode was an original part of the inflection of Indo-European verbs, and is preserved in most of the existing languages of the family; but be and were are the only remaining forms in English in which it is conspicuously distinguished from the indicative. Abbreviated subj.

II. n. In gram., the subjunctive mode.

The subjunctive is evidently passing out of use, and there is good reason to suppose that it will soon become obsolete altogether. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., XIV.

subkingdom (sub'king-dm), n. 1. A prime subdivision of the animal kingdom; a superclass corresponding to the "branches" or "embranchements" of French zoologists, as Cuvier, who recognized the four subkingdoms of the vertebrates, mollusks, articulates, and radiates. Such main groups are now more commonly called phyla. Eight such groups now very generally recognized. In fact if not in name, are Protozoa, Coelenterata, Echinodermata, Vermes, Arthropoda, Mollusca, Mollusca, and Vertebrata. Some authors degrade Vermes from this rank, or otherwise dispose of it as a subkingdom; some elevate the Tunicata to this rank; and the Mollusca are not recognized by all as a subkingdom.

The profile animals of the fifth day's creation belonged to the three Cuvierian subkingdoms of the Radiata, Articulate, and Mollusca, and to the classes of Fish and Reptiles among the Vertebrata. Darwin, Origin of World, p. 213.

2. In bot., a primary division of the vegetable kingdom; the highest class below the kingdom itself. The ordinary division is into two such subkingdoms, the Phanerogamia and the Cryptogamia; but late systematists incline to recognize four: Spermatophyta (corresponding to the Phanerogamia), Pteridophyta, Bryophyta, and Thallophyta (corresponding to Cryptogamia).

sublacunose (sub-lā-kū'nōs), a. Somewhat lacunose.

Convergent to a sublacunose centre. Encyc. Nat. Hist. (1855), III. 580.

sublanate (sub-lā'nāt), a. In bot., somewhat lanate or woolly.

sublanceolate (sub-lan'sē-ō-lāt), a. In zool. and bot., approaching the lanceolate form; somewhat tapering and pointed.

sublapsarian (sub-lap-sā'ri-an), a. and n. [< L. sub, under, + lapsus, fall (see lapse), + -arian.] 1. a. Relating to the sublapsarians or to their tenets.

According to the sublapsarian doctrine. Hammond.

II. n. One who believes in sublapsarianism. Compare supralapsarian.

sublapsarianism (sub-lap-sā'ri-an-iz-m), n. [< sublapsarian + -ism.] The doctrine that the decrees of election and reprobation are subsequent to the fall, or that men are elected to grace or reprobated to death while in a state of sin and ruin.

sublapsary (sub-lap'sā-ri), a. and n. Same as sublapsarian.

sublate (sub-lāt'), v. t.; pret. and pp. sublated, pp. sublating. [< L. sublatus, used as pp. of tollere, raise, take up, < sub, under, from under, + latus, used as pp. of ferre, bear.] 1. To take or carry away; remove. [Rare.]

The authors of y^e mischief [were] sublated & plucked away. Hall, Hen. VII., an. 1.

2. In logic, to deny; opposed to posit.

Where . . . the propositional lines are of uniform breadth, it is hereby shown that all such opposition is sublated. Sir W. Hamilton, Logic, II. 471.

3. In Hegelian logic, to cancel by a subsequent movement.

The process of the external world left to itself in its externality can only be to go into itself, or to sublate or remove its own externality. Craig, Hegel, p. 198.

sublation (sub-lā'shon), n. [< L. sublatio (-n-), a raising, removal, < sublatus, raised, taken away; see sublate.] 1. The act of taking or carrying away. [Rare.]

He could not be forsaken by a sublation of union. Ep. Hall, Remains, p. 188.

2. Cancellation by a subsequent logical movement, in Hegelian philosophy.

sublative (sub-lā-tiv), a. [< sublate + -ive.] Tending to take away or deprive.

sublease (sub-lēs'), n. In law, an under-lease; a lease granted by one who is himself a lessee or tenant. For some purposes, a sublease for the entire remaining term of the sublessor is deemed an assignment rather than a sublease.

sublease (sub-lēs'), v. t.; pret. and pp. subleased, pp. subleasing. To underlease.

He leased his house, . . . and subleased part of it. New York Evening Post, March 3, 1886.

sublessee (sub-lēs-sē'), n. The receiver or holder of a sublease.

sublessor (sub-lēs'or), n. The grantor of a sublease.

sublet (sub-let'), v. t.; pret. and pp. sublet, pp. subletting. To underlet; let to another person, the party letting being himself lessee or tenant.

He's let and sublet, and every man has to make something out of him [the convict] each time. The Century, XL. 221.

sublevaminous (sub-lē-vam'i-nus), a. [< ML. sublevamen (-min-), a lifting, supporting, < L. sublevare, lift, support; see sublevate.] Supporting; upholding.

His upholding and sublevaminous Providence. Feltham, Resolves, ii. 2.

sublevate (sub-lē-vāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. sublevated, pp. sublevating. [< L. sublevatus, pp. of sublevare (> It. sollevare = Pg. Sp. sublevar), lift up from beneath, < sub, under, + levare, lift up, raise, < levare, light.] To raise; elevate; excite. Formerly also sollevate.

sublevation (sub-lē-vā'shon), n. [= Sp. sublevación = Pg. sublevação = It. sollevazione, < L. sublevatio (-n-), a lightening, < sublevare, pp. sublevatus, lift up from beneath, support; see sublevate.] 1. The act of lifting or raising; elevation.—2. A rising or insurrection.

Any general commotion or sublevation of the people. Sir W. Temple, Works (ed. 1731), II. 566.

sublicense (sub-lī'sens), v. t. To underlicense; license to another person under the provisions of a license already held by the person so licensing.

sublieutenant (sub-lī-ten'ant), n. In the British navy, a grade immediately below that of lieutenant. Formerly called mate.

subligation (sub-lī-gā'shon), n. [< L. subligatio (-n-), a binding below, < L. subligare, pp. subligatus, bind below, < sub, under, + ligare, tie, bind; see ligation.] The act of binding underneath. [Rare.] sublimable (sub-lī'mā-bl), a. [< sublimare + -able.] Capable of being sublimated. See sublimation. Boyle, Works, III. 57.

sublimableness (sub-lī'mā-bl-ness), n. The quality of being sublimable. Boyle, Works, I. 573.

sublimary (sub-lī-mā-ri), a. [< sublimare + -ary.] Elevated. [Rare.]

First to the master of the feast
This health is consecrated,
Thence to each sublimary guest
Whose soul doth desire
This nectar to raise and inspire.
A. Brome, The Painter's Entertainment

sublimate (sub'li-māt), v. t.; pret. and pp. sublimated, ppr. sublimating. [L. sublimatus, pp. of sublimare, lift up on high, raise; see sublime, v.] 1. To bring (a solid substance, such as camphor or sulphur) by heat into the state of vapor, which on cooling returns again to the solid state. See sublimation.—2. To extract by or as by sublimation.

It will be a harder alchemy than Lullius ever knew to sublimate any good use out of such an invention.

Milton, Areopagitica, p. 13.

You that have put so fair for the philosopher's stone that you have endeavoured to sublimate it out of poor men's bones ground to powder by your oppressions.

Ken. T. Adams, Works, I. 350.

3. Figuratively, to deprive of earthly dross; elevate; refine; purify; idealize.

And when [the Sultan is] in state, there is not in the world to be seen a greater spectacle of humane glory, and of sublimated manhood.

Sandys, Travailes, p. 59.

I can conceive nothing more sublimating than the strange peril and novelty of an adventure such as this.

Poe, Tales, I. 97.

The atmosphere was light, odor, music; and each and all sublimated beyond anything the sober senses are capable of receiving.

B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 139.

sublimate (sub'li-māt as adj., -māt as noun), u. and n. [L. sublimatus, pp. of sublimare, lift up on high; see sublimate, v.] 1. a. Brought into a state of vapor by heat, and again condensed, as camphor, sulphur, etc.; hence, elevated; purified.

Offering her self more sublimate and pure, in the sacred name and rites of Religion.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 306.

II. n. 1. Anything produced by sublimation or refining.—2. In mineral, the deposit formed, as in a glass tube or on a surface of charcoal, when a mineral containing a volatile ingredient is heated before the blowpipe.—Blue sublimate, a preparation of mercury in combination with flowers of sulphur and sal ammoniac, used in painting.—Corrosive sublimate. See corrosive.

sublimation (sub-li-mā'shon), n. [ME. sublimacion, < OF. (and F.) sublimation = Sp. sublimacion = Pg. sublimação = It. sublimazione, < L.L. sublimatio(n-), a lifting up, a deliverance, < L. sublimare, lift up; see sublimate, sublime, v.] 1. In chem., the act or process of sublimating; a process by which solid substances are, by the aid of heat, converted into vapor, which is again condensed into the solid state by the application of cold.

Sublimation effects for solids to some extent what distillation effects for liquids. Both processes purify the substances to which they are severally applied, by separating them from the fixed matters with which they are associated. Sublimation is usually conducted in one vessel, the product being deposited in the upper part of the vessel in a solid state, and often in the crystalline form, while the impurity remains in the lower part. The vapors of some substances which undergo the process of sublimation condense in the form of a fine powder called flowers; such are the flowers of sulphur, flowers of benzoin, etc. Other sublimates are obtained in a solid and compact form, as camphor, ammonium chlorid, and all the sublimates of mercury.

The quint essencia thereof is naturally incorruptible, the which ge schal drawe out by sublimacion.

Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 4.

2. The act of heightening, refining, purifying, or freeing (something) from baser qualities; as, the sublimation of the affections.—3. That which has been highly refined or purified; hence, the highest product of anything.

Religion is the perfection, refinement, and sublimation of morality.

South.

His verse was the sublimation of his rarest mood.

Steinman, Poets of America, p. 178.

Sublimation theory, in geol. and mining, the theory according to which ore deposits were formed and vein-fissures filled by the volatilization of metalliferous matter from beneath, or from the ignited interior of the earth.

sublimatory (sub'li-mā-tō-ri), a. and n. [ME. sublimatorie = F. sublimatoire, < L.L. sublimator, a lifter, < L. sublimare, lift up; see sublimate.] 1. a. Tending to sublimate; used in sublimation.

II. n.; pl. sublimatories (-riz). A vessel for sublimation.

Violes, crocets, and sublimatories.

Chaucer, Prolog. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 240.

sublime (sub-lim'), a. and n. [F. sublime = Sp. Pg. It. sublime, < L. sublimis, uplifted, high, lofty, sublime; origin unknown.] 1. a. 1. High in place; uplifted; elevated; exalted; lofty.

Lie to thy self, pursue not after Fame; Thunders at the sublimest buildings aimed.

Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 532.

Sublime on these a tower of steel is rear'd

Dryden, Æneid, vi. 748.

2. High in excellence; elevated by nature; exalted above men in general by lofty or noble traits; eminent; said of persons.

The age was fruitful in great men, but amongst them all, if we except the sublime Julian leader, none, as regards splendour of endowments, stood upon the same level as Cicero.

De Quincey, Cicero.

Here dwells no perfect man sublime, Nor woman winged before her time.

Whittier, Last Walk in Autumn.

3. Striking the mind with a sense of grandeur or power, physical or moral; calculated to awaken awe, veneration, exalted or heroic feeling, and the like; lofty; grand; noble; noting a natural object or scenery, an action or conduct, a discourse, a work of man's hands, a spectacle, etc.; as, sublime scenery; sublime heroism.

Easy in Words thy Style, in Sense sublime.

Prior, To Dr. Sherlock.

Know how sublime a thing it is To suffer and be strong.

Longfellow, Light of Stars.

The forms of elevated masses that are most sublime are the lofty and precipitous, as implying the most intense effort of supporting might.

A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 238.

Dinah, covered with her long white dress, her pale face full of subdued emotion, almost like a lovely corpse into which the soul has returned charged with sublimar secrets and a sublimar love.

George Eliot, Adam Bede, xv.

4. Of lofty mien; elevated in manner, expression, or appearance.

His fair large front and eye sublime declared Absolute rule.

Milton, P. L., iv. 300.

For the proud Souldan, with presumptuous cheare And countenance sublime and insolent, Sought only slaughter and avengement.

Spenser, F. Q., v. viii. 30.

5. In anat., superficial; not deep-seated; opposed to profund; as, the sublime flexor of the fingers (the flexor sublimis, a muscle).—Sublime geometry, the theory of higher curves.—Sublime Porte. See Porte.—Syn. 2 and 3. Grand, lofty, sublime, majestic, stately. Grand founds its meanings on the idea of great size, lofty and sublime on that of height. Natural objects may be sublime without physical height, if vastness and great impressiveness are present. In the moral field the sublime is that which is so high above ordinary human achievements as to give the impression of astonishment blended with awe, as the leap of Curtius into the chasm, or the death of the martyr Stephen. In moral things the grand suggests both vastness and elevation. Lofty may imply pride, but in this connection it notes only a lower degree of the sublime, sublime being the strongest word in the language for ideas of its class.

II. n. That which is sublime; commonly with the definite article. (a.) In lit., that which is most elevated, stately, or imposing in style.

The sublime rises from the nobleness of thoughts, the magnificence of words, or the harmonious and lively turn of the phrase.

Addison.

The origin of the sublime is one of the most curious and interesting subjects of inquiry that can occupy the attention of a critic.

Macaulay, Athenian Orators.

(b.) The grand, impressive, and awe inspiring in the works of nature or art as distinguished from the beautiful; occasionally with the indefinite article, to express a particular character of sublimity.

There is a sublime in nature, as in the ocean or the thunder—in moral action, as in deeds of daring and self-denial—and in art, as in statuary and painting by which what is sublime in nature and in moral character is represented and idealized.

Fleming, Vocab. Philos.

(c.) That which has been elevated and sublimated to its extreme limit; a noble and exalted ideal.

Your upward gaze at me now is the very sublime of faith, truth, and devotion.

Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xxv.

Are you—poor, sick, old ere your time— Nearer one whit your own sublime Than we who never have turned a rhyme?

Browning, The Last Ride Together.

sublime (sub-lim'), v.; pret. and pp. sublimed, ppr. subliming. [ME. sublimen, < OF. sublimar = Sp. Pg. sublimar = It. sublimare, < L. sublimare, raise on high, in ML. also sublimare, < sublimis, raised on high, sublime; see sublime, a.] I. trans. 1. To raise on high.

Thou dear vine, . . . Although thy trunk be neither large nor strong, Nor can thy head (not help'd) itself sublime, Yet, like a serpent, a tall tree can climb.

Sir J. Barrow, Old Age, iii.

One mind has climbed Step after step, by just ascent sublimed.

Browning, Sordello.

2. To subliminate.

Th' austere and ponderous juices they sublime Make them ascend the porous soil and climb The orange tree, the citron, and the lime.

Sir R. Blackmore, Creation, ii. 234.

Sub. How do you sublime him? Face. With the Calce of Egg-shells.

B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 5.

3. To elevate; refine; purify; etherealize.

Sublimed thee, and exalted thee, and fixed thee In the third region, called our state of grace.

B. Jonson, Alchemist, i. 1.

I am sublimed! gross earth, Support me not! I walk on air!

Massinger, City Madam, iii. 3.

our Dross but weighs us down into Despair While their sublimed spirits dance f' th' Air.

Brome, Jovial Crew, ii.

A judicious use of metaphors wonderfully raises, sublimates, and adorns oratory of elevation.

Goldsmith, Metaphors.

II. intrans. 1. To be affected by sublimation; be brought or changed into a state of vapor by heat, and then condensed by cold, as camphor or sulphur.

Particles of antimony which will not sublime alone.

Newton, Opticks, iii., query 31.

Different bodies sublime at different temperatures, according to their various degrees of volatility.

Pogg. Sci. Mo., XXV. 203.

2. To become exalted as by sublimation.

This new faith subliming into knowledge

E. H. Sears, The Fourth Gospel, p. 172.

Sublimed sulphur. Same as flowers of sulphur. See sulphur.

sublimely (sub-lim'li), adv. In a sublime manner; with exalted conceptions; loftily.

In English lays, and all sublimely great, Thy Homer warms with all his ancient heat.

Parnell, To Pope.

sublimeness (sub-lim'nes), n. The condition or quality of being sublime; loftiness of sentiment or style; sublimity.

sublimar (sub-li'mér), n. [< sublimar, v., + -er.] One who or that which sublimates; specifically, an apparatus for performing the operation of sublimation. Sublimars are of various forms and materials, according to their special requirements, but each consists essentially of an inclosure of metal, earthenware, or glass, to which heat may be applied, and a condenser or collector for the sublimed substance.

sublimette (sub-li-met'), n. [< F. sublimette, high (see sublime), + dim. -ette.] A variety of music-box.

sublimification (sub-lim-i-fi-kā'shon), n. [< L. sublimis, sublime, + facere, do, make (see -fy), + -ation.] The act of making sublime, or the state of being made sublime.

subliminal (sub-lim'i-nal), a. [< L. sub, under, + limen (limin-), threshold.] Below the threshold of sensation. In the following quotation a similar threshold of consciousness is supposed.

As attention moves away from a presentation its intensity diminishes, and when the presentation is below the threshold of consciousness its intensity is then subliminal, whatever that of the physical stimulus may be.

J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 49.

sublimation (sub-lim-i-tā'shon), n. A subordinate or secondary limitation. De Quincey, Style, iii.

sublimity (sub-lim'i-ti), n.; pl. sublimities (-tiz-). [< F. sublimité = Sp. sublimitud = Pg. sublimitate = It. sublimità, < L. sublimitas, loftiness, elevation, < L. sublimis, raised on high, sublime; see sublimar.] 1. The state of being sublime; that character or quality of anything which marks it as sublime; grandeur. Especially—(a.) Loftiness of nature or character; moral grandeur, as, the sublimity of an action.

The sublimity of the character of Christ owes nothing to his historians.

Euckmister.

(b.) Loftiness of conception; exaltation of sentiment or style.

Milton's chief talent, and, indeed, his distinguishing excellence, lies in the sublimity of his thoughts.

Addison, Spectator, No. 279.

(c.) Grandeur; vastness; majesty, whether exhibited in the works of nature or of art; as, the sublimity of a scene or of a building.

It seems manifest that the most perfect realization of structural beauty and sublimity possible to music is attained by instrumental composition.

J. Sully, Sensation and Intuition, p. 217.

There is also the sensation of great magnitude, corresponding to the voluminous in sound, and lying at the foundation of what we term sublimity.

A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 217.

2. That which is sublime; a sublime person or thing.

The particle of those sublimities Which have relapsed to chaos.

Burns, Cible Harold, iv. 54.

3. The highest degree of its highest quality of which anything is capable; climax; acme.

The sublimity of wisdom is to do those things living which are to be desired when dying.

Jer. Tynd.

Extensive, intensive, etc. sublimity. See the adjectives.—Syn. 1. see sublime.

sublinear (sub-lin'g-wā), a. Nearly linear.

Suture sublinear above and slightly channelled below.

Amer. Nat., XXII. 1047.

sublingua (sub-ling'gwā), n.; pl. sublingua (-gwē). [N.L. (cf. L.L. sublinguum, the epiglottis), < L. sub, under, + lingua, the tongue.] A process of the mucous membrane of the floor of the mouth developed between the tip of the tongue and the symphysis of the lower jaw of some animals, as lemurs; it may acquire considerable size, and become denticulated or pectinated.

In many Prosimii and Chiroptera, as also in the platyrrhine apes, there is a process below the tongue which is sometimes double; this is the so-called sublingua.

Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.) p. 553.

sublingual (sub-līng'gwāl), a. [= F. sublingualis, as sub- + lingual.] 1. Situated under the tongue, or on the under side of the tongue; hypoglossal; specifying various structures. Also subglossal.—2. Of or pertaining to the sublingua.

Sublingual artery, a branch of bifurcation of the lingual artery, arising with the ramus opposite the margin of the hyoglossus muscle, and running on the geniohyoglossus to the sublingual gland.—Sublingual calculus, a salivary calculus of the sublingual gland.—Sublingual cyst. Same as ranula.—Sublingual fossa, a shallow cavity on the inner surface of the inferior maxillary bone above the mylohyoid ridge, and near the symphysis menti, partly lodging the sublingual gland.—Sublingual gland, the smallest salivary gland, lying on the floor of the mouth, discharging by a series of ducts (eight to twenty—the ducts of Rivini) either freely into the mouth or into the duct of Wharton. The longest duct, running along Wharton's duct, and opening with or very near it, is called the duct of Bartholin. See cut under salivary.—Sublingual process, the sublingua.

sublition (sub-līsh'ōn), n. [L. as if sublitione*], < sublino, pp. sublatus, aoint beneath, lay on as a ground-color, prime, < sub, under, + linere, smear; see liniment.] In painting, the act or art of laying the ground-color under the perfect color.

sublittoral (sub-lit'ō-rāl), a. In zoöl., of littoral habits to some extent; living near the sea-shore; especially, living at a somewhat lower horizon under water than that of the littoral zone.

sublobular (sub-lob'ū-lār), a. Situated beneath a lobule. Compare interlobular and intralobular.

The intralobular vein . . . opens into the sublobular vein, and thence into the hepatic vein.

Holten, Anat. (1885), p. 597.

Sublobular veins, branches of the hepatic vein on which the hepatic lobules lie and into which the intralobular veins discharge.

sublunar (sub-lū'nār), a. [= F. sublunaire = Sp. Pg. sublunar = It. sublunare, < L. sub, under, + luna, the moon; see lunar.] Situated beneath or nearer than the moon.

This vast sublunar vault. Milton, P. L., iv. 777.

The city's moonlit spires and myriad lamps
Like stars in a sublunar sky did glow.

Shelley, Revolt of Islam, v. 1.

sublunary (sub-lū'nārī), a. and n. [See sublunar.] 1. a. 1. Situated beneath the moon.

Each sublunary bodie is compoſte
Of the lower elements, which are propoſde
By Nature to that end.

Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 116.

Hence—2. Pertaining to this world; terrestrial; mundane; earthly; worldly; as, sublunary affairs.

All things which are sublunary are subject to change.
Dryden, Parallel of Poetry and Painting.

Am I not now dying a victim to the horror and the mystery of the wildest of all sublunary visions?

Poe, Tales, I. 418.

II.† n. Any worldly thing.

That these sublunaries have their greatest freshness plac'd in only Hope, it is a conviction undeniable; that, upon enjoyment, all our joys do vanish.

Feltham, Resolves, ii. 66.

sublunate (sub-lū'nāt), a. Approaching the form of a crescent; subresecient; as, a sublunate mark.

subluxate (sub-luk'sāt), v. t. To dislocate partially.

subluxation (sub-luk-sā'shōn), n. Partial dislocation.

submammary (sub-mam'a-ri), a. Situated beneath or below the mammary gland; inframammary; also, more deeply seated than this gland.—Submammary abscess, an abscess between the mammary gland and the chest-wall.—Submammary region. Same as inframammary region (which see, under inframammary).

submargin (sub-mār'jīn), n. In entom., a space parallel to a margin and but slightly separated from it.

submarginal (sub-mār'jī-nāl), a. In bot. and zoöl., situated near the margin.—Submarginal cells, in entom., a series of cells in the wing of a hymenopterous insect lying behind the stigma and marginal cell.—Submarginal vein or nervure, in hymenopterous insects, one of the transverse nervures separating the submarginal cells. In the Chalcididae it is a short subcostal vein running from the base of the wing and bending upward to the costal margin, where it takes the name of marginal vein.

submarginate (sub-mār'jī-nāt), a. In entom., bordered with a mark which is slightly separated from the edge.

submargined (sub-mār'jīnd), a. Same as submarginate.

submarine (sub-mā-rēn'), a. and n. [= F. sous-marin = Sp. Pg. submarino; as sub- + marin.]

1. a. 1. Situated or living under or in the sea, either at the bottom or below the surface; below the surface of the sea; as, submarine plants; a submarine telegraph.—2. Occurring or carried on below the surface of the sea; as, submarine explorations; designed for use under the sea; as, submarine armor.—Submarine armor. See armor.—Submarine boat, a boat which is so fitted that it can be propelled when entirely submerged, and carries a sufficient amount of compressed air to admit of remaining below the surface for several hours. The chief object sought is the carrying and operating of torpedoes.—Submarine cable. See cable.—Submarine denudation, denudation which takes place beneath the level of the sea. Some geologists, however, do not clearly distinguish between marine and submarine denudation. In the former, all denudation under or at the edge of the sea is properly included; in the latter, only that which takes place beneath the sea-level.—Submarine forest. See forest.—Submarine gun, a gun adapted for the discharge of projectiles below the surface of the water.—Submarine lamp, mine, etc. See the nouns.—Submarine volcano, a volcano begun beneath the sea, but usually developed by the continued action of the eruptive forces so as to rise above the sea-level, and sometimes to a very considerable height. Some islands thus begun by submarine volcanic agencies have disappeared after a time; others have been permanent. The Mediterranean, the vicinity of the Azores, and the coast of Iceland are localities where submarine volcanic action has been exhibited on a grand scale.

II. n. A submarine plant.
submaster (sub-mās'tēr), n. [OF. sousmaître, F. sousmaître, < ML. submagister, a submaster, < L. sub, under, + magister, master; see master.] A subordinate or deputy master; as, the submaster of a school.

submaxilla (sub-mak-sil'ā), n.; pl. submaxillae (-ā). The under jaw or mandible; especially, the submaxillary bone, or bone of the under jaw.

submaxillary (sub-mak'sil-ārī), a. and n. 1. a. 1. pl. submaxillaries (-rīz). The inferior maxillary bone; the under jaw-bone, inframaxillary, or mandible.

II. a. 1. (a) Of or pertaining to the under jaw or inferior maxilla; forming the basis of the lower jaw, as a bone or bones; mandibular. (b) Of or pertaining to the submaxillary gland; as, submaxillary secretion or saliva.—2. Situated under the jaws; as, the submaxillary triangle.—Submaxillary artery, one of several large branches of the facial artery which supply the submaxillary gland and neighboring parts.—Submaxillary duct, the duct of Wharton.—Submaxillary fossa. See fossa.—Submaxillary ganglion. See ganglion.—Submaxillary gland, a salivary gland situated beneath the lower jaw, on either side, discharging beneath the tongue by Wharton's duct; it is innervated from the chorda tympani and sympathetic nerves. See cut under salivary.—Submaxillary nerve, the inframaxillary nerve.—Submaxillary region. Same as suprahypoid region (which see, under suprahypoid).—Submaxillary triangle. See triangle.—Submaxillary vein, a tributary of the facial vein draining the submaxillary gland.

submaximal (sub-mak'si-māl), a. Nearly but not quite maximal.

Submaximal nerve-irritations.

W. James, Prin. of Psychology, I. 235.

submedial (sub-mē'di-āl), a. Same as submedian.

submedian (sub-mē'di-an), a. Situated near but not at the middle; specifically, in conch., admedian; lying next the middle line on each side, as certain teeth of the radula. Also submedial.—Submedian cell, in entom., same as intermedian cell (which see, under intermedian).

submediant (sub-mē'di-ant), n. In music, the tone of a scale midway between the subdominant and the upper tonic; the sixth, as B in the scale of D. Also called superdominant.

submembranous (sub-mem'brā-nūs), a. Somewhat membranous; a little leathery or coriaceous.

submeningeal (sub-mē-nīn'jē-āl), a. Situated beneath the meninges.

submental (sub-men'tal), a. [submentum + -al.] 1. Situated beneath the chin, or under the edge of the lower jaw. Specifically—2. In entom., of or pertaining to the submentum.—Submental artery, the largest of the cervical branches of the facial artery, given off in the region of the submaxillary gland, and distributed to the muscles of the jaw.

submental vein, that one of the tributary veins of the facial vein which accompanies the submental artery.

submentum (sub-men'tum), n.; pl. submenta (-tī). [NL., < L. sub, under, + mentum, the chin; see mentum.] In entom., the proximal one of two basal median parts or pieces of the labium, the other being the mentum; the proximal one of the two basal parts of the second maxilla. See cuts under mouth-part, palpus, Hymenoptera, and Insecta.

submerge (sub-mér'j'), v. t.; pret. and pp. submerged, ppr. submerging. [OF. submerger, soubmerger, F. submerger = Pr. submerger, submergir, soumergir = Sp. sumergir = Pg. submerger = It. sommergere, < L. submergere, summergere, plunge under, sink, overwhelm, < sub, under, + mergere, dip, sink, plunge; see merge.] 1. trans. 1. To put under water; plunge.—2. To cover or overflow with water; inundate; drown.

So half my Egypt were submerged, and made A cistern for scaled snakes!

Shak., A. and C., ii. 5. 94.

Submerged bog, submerged forest, a bog or forest sunk below its original position, so that it has become covered by water. Thus, at Clonea, near Dungarvan, in Ireland, there are remains of an ancient pine forest, miles in length, now usually covered with many fathoms of water.—Submerged pump. See pump.

II. intrans. To sink under water; be buried or covered, as by a fluid; sink out of sight.

There is . . . a plot, which emerges more than once, for carrying the King to Rouen; plot after plot emerging and submerging, like ignes fatui in foul weather, which lead nowhither.

Carlyle, French Rev., II. iii. 4.

submergence (sub-mér'jens), n. [submerge + -ence.] The act of submerging, or plunging under water; the state of being submerged; submersion; hence, a sinking out of sight.

submerse (sub-mér's'), v. t. [L. submersus, summersus, pp. of submergere, summergere, submerge; see submerge.] To put under water; submerge. [Rare.] submerse (sub-mér's'), a. [L. submersus, pp.: see the verb.] Same as submersed.

submersed (sub-mérst'), p. a. In bot., growing under water, as the leaves of aquatic plants. Also demersed and submerged.

submersible (sub-mér'si-bl), a. [submerse + -ible.] That may be submersed. The Engineer, LXVII. 59.

submersion (sub-mér'shōn), n. [= F. submersion = Sp. sumersion = Pg. submersão = It. sommersione, < L. submersio (n-), summersio (n-), a sinking, submerging, < L. submergere, summergere, submerge; see submerge.] The act of submerging, or the state of being submerged.

submetallic (sub-me-tal'ik), a. Imperfectly or partially metallic; as, the submetallic luster of wolfram.

submiliary (sub-mil'i-ārī), a. Slightly smaller than miliary. Laurel, 1891, I.

subminimal (sub-min'i-māl), a. Less than minimal.

subminister (sub-min'is-tēr), v. [OF. subministrare = Sp. suministrar = Pg. subministrar, < L. subministrare, subministrare, aid by giving, afford, supply, < sub, under, + ministrare, attend, provide, furnish, < ministrare, an attendant; see minister.] 1. trans. To supply; afford; administer. Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Man-kind, p. 154.

II. intrans. To subserve; be useful; be subservient. Sir R. L'Estrange.

subministrant (sub-min'is-trant), a. [L. subministrans (t-s), subministrans (t-s), ppr. of subministrare, subministrare, aid by giving, supply; see subminister.] Subservient; subordinate. Bacon.

subministratē (sub-min'is-trāt), v. t. [L. subministratus, subministratus, pp. of subministrare, subministrare, aid by giving, supply; see subminister.] Same as subminister. Harvey.

subministration (sub-min'is-trā'shōn), n. [OF. subministratio = Sp. suministración = Pg. subministração, < L. subministratio (n-), sumministratio (n-), a giving, supplying; see subminister.] The act of subministering, or furnishing or supplying. Sir H. Wotton, Reliquiae, p. 529.

submit (sub-mis'), a. [= OF. submitis, soumis, soumis, F. soumis = Sp. sumiso = Pg. submisso = It. sunnesso, < L. submitis, summissus, pp. of submittere, summittere, put under, lower, reduce; see submit.] 1. Humble; submissive. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Nearer his presence—Adam, though not awed,
Yet with submit approach and reverence kneel,
As to a superior nature bowing low.

Milton, P. L., v. 359.

A simple, submit, humble style.

C. Mather, Mag. Chris., Int.

2†. Low; soft; gentle.

Thus th' old Hebrew muttering gan to speak
In submit voice, that Isaac might not hear His bitter grief.

Sylvester, tr. of Dr Barts's Weeks, ii., The Fathers.

These are crying sins, and have shrill voices in heaven;
neither are they submit and whispering on the earth.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 213.

submission (sub-mish'on), n. [< OF. submis-sion, submissio, submissio, F. soumission = Sp. submisión = Pg. submissão = It. sottomissione, < L. submissio(n-), submissio(n-), a letting down, lowering, sinking, < submittere, summittere, pp. submissus, summissus, put under, let down, lower, reduce; see submit.] 1. The act of submitting, in any sense of that word; especially, the act of yielding; entire surrender to the control or government of another.

*Submission, Dauphin! 'tis a mere French word;
We English warriors wot not what it means.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iv. 7. 54.*

*This known we are up, and marching. No submission,
No promise of base peace, can cure our maladies.
Fletcher, Loyal Subject, v. 4.*

der, + Gr. exopt, a dead body, + uapog, form. A division of neuropterous insects (in a broad sense), including those which have quiescent incomplete pupae, which, however, acquire the power of locomotion before they assume the perfect state. It corresponds closely with the modern restricted order Neuroptera (as distinguished from the Pseudoneuroptera).

subnect (sub-nekt'), v. t. [< L. subnectere, tie under, bind on beneath, < sub, under, +nectere, pp. nectus, bind, tie, fasten. Cf. annex, connect. See also subnex.] To tie, buckle, or fasten beneath. Imp. Dict.

subnervian (sub-nér'vi-an), a. Same as subneural. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 679.

subneural (sub-nú'ral), a. Situated beneath a main neural axis or nervous cord; in annelids, specifying that one of the longitudinal trunks of the pseudoneural system which runs beneath the ganglionic cord, as in the earthworm. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 185.

subnext (sub-neks'), v. t. [< L. subnex, pp. of subnectere, tie under; see subnect.] To subjoin; add. Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 873.

subnitrate (sub-ní'trát), a. A basic nitrate, capable of saturating more nitric acid, thus forming a normal nitrate.

subniveal (sub-ní'vè-ál), a. Same as subnivean.

subnivean (sub-ní'vè-an), a. Situated or carried on under the snow. [Rare.]

*At a spot where the whiffing winds had left the earth nearly bare [of snow], he commenced his subnivean walk.
S. Judd, Margaret, i. 17.*

Subnobiles (sub-nob'i-léz), n. pl. [NL., < L. sub, under, + nobilis, noble.] In ornith., in Sundeval's system, a cohort of the order Proceres, established to distinguish the Apterygida or kiwis from other ratite or struthious birds.

subnodal (sub-nó'dál), a. In cutum, situated behind the nodus, a point near the center of the costal margin, in the wings of certain dragonflies, where the nervures appear to be knotted.

subnormal (sub-nór'mál), a. and n. I. a. 1. Less than normal; abnormal by defect or deficiency.—2. In math., cut off by the normal.

II. n. That part of the axis of abscissas of a curve which is intercepted between the normal and the ordinate.—Polar subnormal, the line drawn from the origin of polar coordinates perpendicular to the radius vector to meet the normal.

subnormality (sub-nór-mal'i-ti), n. [< subnormal + -ity.] The state or condition of being subnormal. Lancet, 1890, I. 105.

subnotation (sub-nó-tá'shón), n. [< L. subnotatio(n-), a signing underneath, a subscription, < subnotare, pp. subnotatus, note or write underneath, subscribe, < sub, under, + notare, note, mark; see notat.] Same as rescript, 1.

subnubilar (sub-nú'bi-lär), a. [< L. sub, under, + nubila, clouds (see subnubular), < -ar.] Situated under the clouds. [Rare.]

*The every-day observation of the most unlettered man who treads the fields and is wet with the mists and rains must convince him that there is no subnubilar solid sphere.
Darwin, Origin of the World, p. 63.*

subnude (sub-núd'), a. In bot., almost naked or bare of leaves.

subnubular (sub-nú'vô-lär), a. [< L. sub, under, + It. nubola, a cloud, < L. nubiola, clouds, neut. pl. of nubilus, cloudy; see nubilous. Cf. L. subnubilus, somewhat cloudy, < sub, under, + nubilus, cloudy.] Somewhat cloudy; partially covered or obscured by clouds. [Rare.]

Subnubular lights of evening. Lord Houghton.

subobscure (sub-ob-skür'), a. [< L. subobscurus, somewhat obscure, < sub, under, + obscurus, obscure; see obscure.] Somewhat obscure.

subobscurely (sub-ob-skür'li), adv. Somewhat obscurely or darkly. Thomas, Devotions, p. 218.

subobtuse (sub-ob-tüs'), a. Somewhat obtuse.

suboccipital (sub-ok-sip'i-tál), a. 1. Situated under the hindhead, or below (back of) the occipital bone, as a nerve.—2. Situated on the under surface of the occipital lobe of the brain, as a gyrus or a fissure. Suboccipital nerve, the first cervical nerve.—Suboccipital triangle. See triangle.

suboceanic (sub-ô-shé-an'ik), a. Lying beneath the ocean. Nature, XL. 658.

subocellate (sub-os'el-ät), a. Indistinctly ocellate; somewhat resembling an ocellus; in cutum, noting spots on the wings of butterflies, etc., surrounded by a ring of another color, but destitute of a central spot or pupil. Also called blind or opaculate spots.

suboctave (sub-ok'täv), n. 1. An eighth part, our gallon, which has the pint for its suboctave. Arbuthnot, Anc. Coins

2. In music, the octave below a given tone.—Suboctave coupler, in organ-building, a coupler which adds digitals an octave below those struck, either on the same keyboard or on another.

suboctuple (sub-ok'tū-pl), a. Containing one part of eight; having the ratio 1:8. Rp. Wilkins, Archimedes, vii.

subocular (sub-ok'ū-lār), a. [L. subocularis, that is beneath the eye, < sub, under, + ocularis, pertaining to the eye, < oculus, eye.] Situated under the eye; suborbital; suboptic.—Subocular antennæ, in entom., antennæ inserted below the eyes, as in most Hemiptera.

subesophageal, a. See subesophageal.

subopercle (sub-ō-pēr'kl), n. The subopercular bone, or suboperculum, of a fish.

subopercular (sub-ō-pēr'kū-lār), a. [< suboperculum + -ar]. Composing a lower part of the operculum or gill-flap of a fish; pertaining to a suboperculum in any sense, or having its character. See ent under opercular.

suboperculum (sub-ō-pēr'kū-lum), n.; pl. subopercula (-lā). [NL. < L. sub, under, + operculum, a lid, cover.] 1. In ichth., the subopercular bone, an inferior one of four opercular bones usually entering into the composition of the gill-cover, of which it forms a part of the lower margin. See ent under opercular and teleost.—2. In anat. of the brain, a part of an orbital gyre which to some extent covers the insula or island of Reil in front, and is situated under the preoperculum.

suboptic (sub-op'tik), a. Same as suborbital; as, the suboptic foramen.

suboral (sub-ō'rāl), a. Placed under the mouth or oral orifice.

Other specimens with the characteristic dorsal surface have no suboral avicularium. Geol. Jour., LXVII. 6.

suborbicular (sub-ōr-bik'ū-lār), a. Almost orbiculate or orbicular; nearly circular.

suborbiculate (sub-ōr-bik'ū-lāt), a. Same as suborbicular.

suborbital (sub-ōr'bi-tāl), a. and n. 1. a. Situated below the orbit of the eye or on the floor of that orbit; infra-orbital; subocular. Also suboptic, suborbital.—Suborbital cartilage. See II.—Suborbital foramen, the infra-orbital foramen (which see, under foramen).—Suborbital fossa. Same as canine fossa.

II. n. A special formation of parts below, along the lower border of, or on the floor of the orbit of the eye. (a) A branch of the second division of the fifth nerve, which in various animals, as man, runs under the orbit and escapes upon the cheek through the suborbital foramen. (b) One of a chain of bones or cartilages which in many of the lower vertebrates borders the brain of the orbit below, and corresponds to a like series which may form the supra-orbital margin. The great development of one of these suborbitals is a prominent feature of the mail-checked or cottoid fishes. See Sclerophris, and ent under teleost.

subordain (sub-ōr-dān'), v. t. To ordain to an inferior position. [Rare.]

For she is finite in her acts and powere,
But so is not that Powere omnipotent
That Nature subordain'd chief Governor
Of fading creatures while they do endure.
Darwin, Mirum in Modum, p. 24. (Darwin.)

suborder (sub-ōr'ō-dēr), n. 1. In bot. and zool., a subdivision of an order; a group subordinate to an order; a superfamily. See family, 6, and order, n., 5.—2. In arch., a subordinate or secondary order; an order introduced for decoration, or chiefly so, as distinguished from a main order of the structure.

In the triforium of the choir [of the cathedral of Senlis] the shafts which carry the sub-orders of the arches are comparatively slender monoliths.
C. H. Moore, Gothic Architecture, p. 202.

subordinacy (sub-ōr'di-nā-si), n. [< subordinatus (see sub), + -acy]. The state of being subordinate, or subject to control; subordination. [Rare.]

He forms a Whole, coherent and proportioned in itself, with due subjection and Subordinacy of constituent Parts.
Shafesbury, Advice to an Author, i. § 3.

subordinal (sub-ōr'di-nāl), a. [< NL. subordo (-ordin-), suborder (< L. sub, under, + ordo, order), + -al]. Of the classificatory rank or taxonomic value of a suborder; subordinate to an order, as a group or division of animals; of or pertaining to a suborder.

subordinance (sub-ōr'di-nāns), n. [< subordinatus + -ance]. Same as subordinacy.

subordinancy (sub-ōr'di-nānsi), n. [As subordinance (see sub).] 1. Subordinacy.—2. Subordinate places or offices collectively.

The subordinancy of the government changing hands so often.
Sir W. Temple.

subordinary (sub-ōr'di-nā-ri), n. In her., a bearing of simple figure, often appearing, but not considered so common or so important as one of the ordinaries. See ordinary, 9. Those bearings which are called ordinaries by some writers and not by others are called subordinaries by these latter; such are the pile, the incutcheon, the bend sinister, the canton or quarter, the border, the orle, and the point.

subordinate (sub-ōr'di-nāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. subordinated, ppr. subordinating. [< ML. subordinatus, pp. of subordinare (> It. subordinare = Sp. subordinar = F. subordonner), place in a lower order, make subject, < L. sub, under, + ordinare, order, arrange: see ordinate, order, v.] 1. To place in an order or rank below something else; make or consider as of less value or importance: as, to subordinate temporal to spiritual things.

So plans he,
Always subordinating (note the point!)
Revenge, the milder sin, to interest,
The meaner. Browning, Ring and Book, II. 186.

All that is merely circumstantial shall be subordinated to and in keeping with what is essential.
J. Caird.

2. To make auxiliary or subservient to something else; put under control or authority; make subject.

The stars fight in their courses under his banner, and subordinate their powers to the dictates of his will.
South, Sermons, VII. 1.

The branch societies were subordinated to the central one.
English Guilds (L. E. T. S.), p. cxxxv.

There is no known vertebrate in which the whole of the germ-product is not subordinated to a single axis.
H. Spencer, Trin. of Biol., § 50.

Subordinating conjunction. See conjunction, 3.

subordinate (sub-ōr'di-nāt), a. and n. [= F. subordonné = Sp. subordinado = It. subordinato, < ML. subordinatus, place in a lower order: see subordinate, v.] 1. a. 1. In a lower order or class; occupying a lower position in a descending scale; secondary.

Life is the function of the animal's body considered as one whole, just as the subordinate functions are those of the body's several sets of organs.
Mivart, Nature and Thought, p. 188.

2. Inferior in order, nature, dignity, power, rank, importance, etc.

It was subordinate, not enslaved, to the understanding.
South.

The great . . . are naturally averse to a power raised over them, and whose weight must ever lean heaviest on the subordinate orders.
Goldsmith, Vicar, xix.

Subordinate cause. See cause, 1.—Subordinate clause. (a) In gram., same as dependent clause. (See under clause, 3.) Such a clause has the value of either a noun, an adjective, or an adverb in some other clause to which it is subordinated, being introduced either by a relative pronoun or an adverb, or by a subordinating conjunction. (b) In law, a clause in a statute which, from its position or the nature of its substance, or especially by reason of grammatical relation as above indicated, must be deemed controlled or restrained in its meaning if it conflicts with another clause in the same statute.—Subordinate end. See end, 5. Syn. Subservient, minor.

II. n. One inferior in power, order, rank, dignity, office, etc.; one who stands in order or rank below another; often, one below and under the orders of another; in gram., a word or clause dependent on another.

His next subordinate,
Awakening, thus to him in secret spake.
Milton, P. L., v. 671.

subordinately (sub-ōr'di-nāt-lī), adv. In a subordinate manner; in a lower order, class, rank, or dignity; as of inferior importance.

subordinateness (sub-ōr'di-nāt-nes), n. The state of being subordinate or inferior.

subordination (sub-ōr'di-nā'shon), n. [= F. subordination = Sp. subordinación = Pg. subordinação = It. subordinazione, < ML. subordinatio (n-), < L. sub, under, + ordinare, furnish, suborn: see suborn.] 1. The act of subordinating, subjecting, or placing in a lower order, rank, or position, or in proper degrees of rank; also, the state of being subordinate or inferior; inferiority of rank or dignity.

There being no Religion that tends so much to the peace of mens minds and the preservation of civil Societies as this [the Christian religion] doth; yet all this it doth by way of subordination to the great end of it, which is the promoting mens eternal happiness.
Stillingfleet, Sermons, I. iv.

In his narrative a due subordination is observed: some transactions are prominent; others retire.
Macanlay, History.

24. Degree of lesser rank.

Persons who, in their several subordinations, would be obliged to follow the example of their superiors. Swift.

3. The state of being under control of government; subjection to rule; habit of obedience to orders.

Never, never more shall we behold that generous loyalty to rank and sex, that proud submission, that dignified obedience, that subordination of the heart, which kept alive, even in servitude itself, the spirit of an exalted freedom.
Burke, Rev. in France.

They were without subordination, patience, industry, or any of the regular habits demanded for success in such an enterprise.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., II. 8.

subordinationism (sub-ōr'di-nā'shon-izm), n. [< subordination + -ism]. In theol., the doctrine that the second and third persons of the Trinity are inferior to God the Father as regards (a) order only, or (b) as regards essence. The former doctrine is considered orthodox, the latter is that of the Arians and others.

Justin . . . did not hold a strict subordinationism.
Liddon, Divinity of Our Lord, p. 430.

subordinative (sub-ōr'di-nā-tiv), a. [< subordinate + -ive]. Tending to subordinate; causing, implying, or expressing subordination or dependence.

suborn (sub-ōrn'), v. t. [< F. suborner = Sp. subornar = It. subornare, < L. subornare, furnish, equip, fit out, incite secretly, < sub, under, + ornare, fit out, provide, ornament.] 1. To furnish; equip; adorn; ornament.

Evil things, being decked and suborned with the gay attire of goodly words, may easily deceive.
Spenser, State of Ireland.

2. To furnish or procure unlawfully; procure by indirect means.

So men oppressed, when weary of their breath,
Throw off the burden, and suborn their death.
Dryden, Pal. and Arc., iii. 1039.

3. To bribe or unlawfully procure to some act of wickedness—specifically, in law, to giving false testimony; induce, as a witness, to perjury.

He had put to death two of the kynes which were the chief authors of this newe reuolte, and had suborned Guarionexius and the other kynes to attempte the same.
Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, ed. [Arber, p. 84].

By heaven, fond wretch, thou know'st not what thou speak'st:
Or else thou art suborn'd against his honour
In hateful practice.
Shak., M. for M., v. 1. 106.

It was he indeed
Suborned us to the calumny.
B. Jonson, Poetaster, v. 1.

A faithless clerk, who had been suborned . . . to betray their consultations, was promptly punished.
Bancroft, Hist. U. S., I. 148.

To bribe a trustee, as such, is in fact neither more nor less than to suborn him to be guilty of a breach or an abuse of trust.
Bentham, Introd. to Morals and Legislation, [xvi. 27, note 3.]

subornation (sub-ōr-nā'shon), n. [= F. subornation = Sp. subornación = Pg. subornação = It. subornazione, < ML. subornatio (n-), < L. sub, under, + ornare, furnish, suborn: see suborn.] 1. The act of procuring wrongfully.—2. The act of procuring one by persuasion, bribery, etc., to do a criminal or bad action; specifically, in law, the crime of procuring perjured testimony; procuring a witness to commit the crime of perjury; more specifically called subornation of perjury.

The subornation of witnesses, or the corrupt sentence of a judge!
Rp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. xvii.

Foul subornation is predominant.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 1. 145.

suborner (sub-ōr'nér), n. [< suborn + -er]. One who suborns; one who procures another to do a bad action, especially to take a false oath.
Bacon, Charge at Session for the Verge.

subostracal (sub-ōs'trā-kāl), a. Situated under the shell; noting a dorsal cartilage of some cephalopods.

A thin plate-like subostracal or (so-called) dorsal cartilage, the anterior end of which rests on and fits into the concave nuclear cartilage.
Encyc. Brit., XVI. 675.

Subostracea (sub-ōs-trā'sē-ā), n. pl. [NL. (De Blainville), < L. sub, under, + NL. Ostracea]. A group of lamellibranchs or bivalve mollusks, so named from their relationship to the oyster family, including such forms as the thorn-oysters (Spondylidae), etc. See ent under Spondylus.

subparietal (sub-pä-rí'e-täl), a. Situated beneath or below the parietal bone or lobe.—Subparietal sulcus, a small inconstant sulcus extending back from the callosomarginal sulcus at its angle.

subpectinate (sub-pek'ti-nät), a. Imperfectly pectinate, as antennae which exhibit a form between serrate and pectinate.

subpeduncular (sub-pē-dung'kü-lär), a. Situated below a peduncle of the cerebellum.—Subpeduncular lobe of the cerebellum. Same as flocculus, 2.

subpedunculate (sub-pē-dung'kü-lät), a. Having a very short stem or peduncle; scarcely pedunculate; subpetiolate. See cut under Polistes.

subpellucid (sub-pe-hü'sid), a. Nearly or almost pellucid; somewhat pellucid or clear.

subpena, subpenal. See subpana, subpanal. Subpentamera (sub-pen-tam'c-rä), n. pl. [N.L.] Same as Cryptopentamera or Pseudotetramera.

subpentamerous (sub-pen-tam'e-rus), a. Same as cryptopentamerous or pseudotetramerous.

subpentangular (sub-pen-tang'gü-lär), a. Irregularly or imperfectly pentagonal; having five sides of different lengths, or five rounded-off angles.

subpericardial (sub-per-i-kär'di-äl), a. Situated or occurring beneath the pericardium.

subpericranial (sub-per-i-kra'ní-äl), a. Situated or occurring under the pericranium.

subperiosteal (sub-per-i-os'tē-äl), a. Situated or occurring beneath the periosteum.—Subperiosteal amputation, an amputation in which the periosteum is dissected up from the bone before the bone is cut, so that the cut end of the bone may be covered by the flaps of periosteum.—Subperiosteal blastema, the osteogenic layer of the periosteum. Kolliker.

subperiosteally (sub-per-i-os'tē-äl-i), adv. In a subperiosteal manner.

subperitoneal (sub-per'i-tō-nē-äl), a. Situated beneath the peritoneum—that is, on its outer or attached surface.—Subperitoneal abscess, an abscess situated between the abdominal wall and the parietal peritoneum.—Subperitoneal fascia, the layer of areolar and fatty tissue attaching the peritoneum to the surfaces it covers.

subpermanent (sub-pēr'mä-nent), a. Somewhat permanent; remaining for a time, but with gradual loss of intensity: as, the subpermanent magnetism of iron.

It was impossible in many cases to avoid imparting subpermanent torsion. Proc. Roy. Soc., XXXVIII, 42.

subperpendicular (sub-pēr-pen-dik'ü-lär), a. A subnormal.

subpetiolar (sub-pet'i-ö-lär), a. In bot., situated under or within the base of the petiole, as the leaf-buds of the plane-tree (Platanus).

subpetiolate (sub-pet'i-ö-lät), a. 1. In bot., having a very short petiole.—2. In zool., somewhat petiolate, as an insect's abdomen; subpedunculate. See cut under Polistes.

subpharyngeal (sub-fä-rin'jē-äl), a. Situated beneath or below the pharynx, as a nervous ganglion or commissure.

subphratry (sub'frä tri), n. A subdivision of a phratry. Encyc. Brit., XXIII, 474.

subphrenic (sub-fren'ik), a. Lying beneath the diaphragm.—Subphrenic abscess, an abscess between the diaphragm and the liver.

subphyllar (sub-fil'är), a. Subordinate to a phylum in taxonomic rank; of the classificatory value of a subphylum.

subphylum (sub'fili lum), n.: pl. subphyla (-lä). A prime division or main branch of a phylum; a group of a grade next below that of a phylum. Encyc. Brit., XXIV, 810.

subpia (sub-pi'äl), a. Situated beneath the pia mater.

subpilose (sub-pi'lös), a. In bot. and entom., thinly pilose or hairy.

subplantigrade (sub-plan'ti-gräd), a. Not quite plantigrade; walking with the heel a little raised.

subpleural (sub-plö'ral), a. Situated beneath the outer or attached side of the pleura.—Sub- pleural emphysema, that form of interstitial emphysema in which air is found in the subpleural connective tissue.

subplexal (sub-plek'säl), a. Lying under a plexus of the brain. Back's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VIII, 145.

subplinth (sub'plinth), n. In arch., a second and lower plinth placed under the principal one in columns and pedestals.

subpena, subpena (sub-pē'nä or su-pē'nä), n. [So called from the initial words of the writ in its original form, L. sub panā, 'under penalty': sub, under; panā, abl. of panis, pain, penalty: see *pain*².] In law, a writ or process commanding the attendance in a court of justice of the person on whom it is served, under a penalty. Specifically (a) The process by which bills in equity are enforced; a writ, issued by chancery in the name of the sovereign or of the people, commanding the person complained of to appear and answer the matter alleged against him, and abide by the order or decree of the court, under penalty of a fine, etc. Hence—(b) In old Eng. law, a suit in equity. (c) A writ by which the attendance of witnesses is required: used now in all courts. If the writ requires the witness to bring writings, books, or the like with him, it is called a subpena duces tecum.

subpena, subpena (sub- or su-pē'nä), v. t. [L. subpana, subpana, n.] To serve with a writ of subpena; command the attendance of in court by a legal writ: as, to subpena a witness.

My friend, who has a natural aversion to London, would never have come up, had he not been subpanned to it, as he told me, in order to give his testimony for one of the rebels. Addison, Freeholder, No. 44.

subpenal, subpenal (sub- or su-pē'näl), a. [L. subpana + -al.] Subject to penalty.

Arbutnot, Aliments, II.

Now Jove suspends his golden scales in air,

Weights the men's wits against the lady's hair; . . .

At length the wits mount up, the hairs subside.

Pope, R. of the L., v, 74.

The coast both south and north of Callao has subsided.

Darwin, Geol. Observations, II, 272.

4. To stop talking; be quiet; be less conspicuous; as, you had better subside. [Colloq.] = Syn. 2. Abate, Subside, Intermit (see abate); retire, hull.

subsidence (sub-si'dens or sub'si-dens), n. [L. subsidere + -ence.] The act or process of subsiding, in any sense of the verb subside.

With poetry it was rather better. He delighted in the swell and subsidence of the rhythm, and the happily-recurring rhyme.

Hawthorne, Seven Gables, x.

In certain large areas where subsidence has probably been long in progress, the growth of the corals has been sufficient to keep the reefs up to the surface.

Burton, Coral Reefs, p. 104.

= Syn. Ebb, decrease, diminution, abatement.

subsidiency (sub-si'den-si or sub'si-den-si), n. [L. subsidere + -ency.] Subsidence. T. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

subsidiarily (sub-si'di-ār-i-li), adv. In a subsidiary manner. Amer. Jour. Philol., IX, 147.

subsidiary (sub-si'di-ār-i), a. and n. [= F. subsidiaire = Sp. Pg. subsidiaria = It. sussidiaria, < L. subsidiarius, belonging to a reserve, < subsidium, a reserve, help, relief: see subsidi.] I. a. 1. Held ready to furnish assistance; held as a reserve.

There is no error more frequent in war than, after brisk preparations, to halt for subsidiary forces.

Baron, Fable of Persens.

2. Lending assistance; aiding; assistant; furnishing help; ancillary.

We must so far satisfy ourselves with the word of God as that we despise not those other subsidiary helps which God in his church hath afforded us. Donne, Sermons, II.

No ritual is too much, provided it is subsidiary to the inner work of worship; and all ritual is too much unless it ministers to that purpose.

Gladstone, Might of Right, p. 222.

3. Furnishing supplementary supplies; as, a subsidiary stream.—4. Relating or pertaining to a subsidy; founded on or connected with a subsidy or subsidies; as, a subsidiary treaty.—Subsidiary note. Same as accessory note (which see, under note).—Subsidiary quantity or symbol, in math., a quantity or symbol which is not essentially a part of a problem, but is introduced to help in the solution. The phrase is particularly applied to angles in trigonometrical investigations.—Subsidiary troops, troops of one nation hired by another for military service.

II. n.; pl. subsidiaries (-riz). 1. One who or that which contributes aid or additional supplies; an auxiliary; an assistant. Hammond.

—2. In music, a subordinate theme or subject, especially in an episode of an extended work.

subsidize (sub'si-diz), v. t.; pret. and pp. subsided, ppr. subsiding. [L. subsidere + -ize.] To furnish with a subsidy; purchase the assistance of by the payment of a subsidy; hence, in recent use, to secure the coöperation of by bribing; buy over. Also spelled subsidise.

He obtained a small supply of men from his Italian allies, and subsidized a corps of eight thousand Swiss, the strength of his infantry. Prescott, Peril, and Isa., II, 14.

Pietro could never save a dollar? Straight

He must be subsidized at our expense.

Browning, King and Book, I, 155.

subsidy (sub'si-di), n.; pl. subsidi (-diz). [= F. subsidie = Pr. subside = Sp. Pg. subsidio

= It. sussidio, help, aid, subsidy, < L. subsidium, troops stationed in reserve, auxiliary forces, help in battle, in gen. help, aid, relief, < subsideri, sit down, settle, remain, lie in wait: see subside.] An aid in money; pecuniary aid.

Out of small earnings, he managed to transmit no small comforts and subsides to old parents living somewhere in Munster. Thackeray, Philip, xvi.

Especially (a) In Eury hosp., an aid or tax formerly granted by Parliament to the crown for the urgent occasions of the realm, and levied on every subject of ability according to the value of his lands or goods; a tax levied on a particular occasion.

That made us pay . . . one shilling to the pound, the last subsidy. Shak., 2 Hen., VI., iv, 7, 25.

Tonnage and poundage was granted for a year, and a new and complicated form of subsidy was voted.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., s 334.

(b) A sum paid, often according to treaty, by one government to another, sometimes to secure its neutrality, but more frequently to meet the expenses of carrying on a war.

The continental allies of England were eager for her subsides, and lukewarm as regarded operations against the common enemy.

Sir E. Creasy, Hist. Eng., I, xiii. (Latham.)

(c) Any direct pecuniary aid furnished by the state to private industrial undertakings, or to eleemosynary institutions. Such aid includes bounties on exports, those paid to the owners of ships for running them, and donations of land or money to railroad, manufacturing, theatrical, and other enterprises.

A postal subsidy . . . is simply a payment made for the conveyance under certain specified conditions as to time and speed, of postal matter.

H. Fawcett, Free Trade and Protection (ed. 1881), p. 29.

It seems clear, therefore, that subsides as a means of restoring American shipping cannot be made the policy of the United States.

D. A. Wells, Our Merchant Marine, p. 111.

= Syn. Subsidy, Subvention. In the original and essential meaning of a government grant in aid of a commercial enterprise, these terms are substantially equivalent; but two circumstances lead to some difference in common usage. (a) Such grants being rarely, if ever, made in England or the United States except in aid of the mercantile marine, the establishment of lines of transportation, or the like, subsidy is used more commonly than subvention in reference to such enterprises, while, such grants being frequent in France in aid of the drama and the press, etc., the word subvention is used more commonly than subsidy in application to enterprises connected with literature and the arts. (b) Writers who oppose all such uses of public funds commonly prefer to characterize them as subsides, while those who approve of them commonly prefer the term subvention.

subsign (sub-sim'), v. t. [L. subsignare, pp. subsignatus, write beneath, subscribe, sign, < sub, under, + signare, set a mark upon, sign: see sign.] 1. To sign; sign under; write beneath; subscribe.

A letter of the Sophy . . . subsigned with the hands both of the Sophy & his Secretary.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I, 334.

2. To assign by signature to another.

His (Philip III.) rents and custome [were] subsigned, for the most parte, for money borrowed.

Sir C. Cornwallis, quoted in Motley's Hist. Netherlands, IV, 280.

subsignation (sub-sig-nā'shon), n. [L. subsignatio (-tio), a signature, < subsignare, sign: see subsign.] The act of writing the name or its equivalent under something for attestation; the name so written. [Obsolete or rare.]

The epistle with subsignation of the scribe and notary Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist (1616), p. 300. (Latham.)

For a good while after the Conquest the usage of subsignation with crosses was sometimes retained.

Madox, Formulare Anglicanum (ed. 1702), p. xxvii subsimsious (sub-sim'i-us), a. Nearly simious or monkey-like; as, "a subsimsious absurdity." Swinburne. [Rare.]

subsist (sub-sist'), v. [F. subsister = Sp. Pg. subsistir = It. sussistere, sussistere, < L. subsistere, take a stand or position, stand still, stop, stay, remain, continue, < sub, under, + sistere, cause to stand, place: see sist. Cf. consist, desist, crisist, insist, persist.] I. intrans. 1. To remain; continue; abide; retain the existing state.

Firm we subsist, but possible to swerve.

Milton, P. L., ix, 339.

It is a pity the same fashion don't subsist now.

Walspole, Letters, II, 62.

2. To have continued existence; exist.

Can the body
Subsist, the soul departed? 'Tis as easy
As to live without you.

Bacon, and Fl., Custom of the Country, v, 4.

Those ideas which Plato sometimes contends to be substances, and to subsist alone by themselves.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 499.

These enthusiasts do not scruple to avow their opinion that a state can subsist without any religion better than with one.

Burke, Rev. in France.

3. To be maintained; be supported; live.

Had it been our sad lot to subsist on other men's charity.
J. Atterbury.

4. To inhere; have existence by means of something else.

Though the general natures of these qualities are sufficiently distant from one another, yet when they come to subsist in particulars, and to be clothed with several accidents, then the discernment is not so easy. South.

II. trans. 1t. To keep in existence.

The old town [of Selvee] is thinly inhabited; the present city, which is a poor place, is to the west of it, and is chiefly subsisted by being a great thorough fare. Pococke, Description of the East, II. ii. 133.

2. To feed; maintain; support with provisions.

I will raise one thousand men, subsist them at my own expense, and march myself at their head for the relief of Boston. Washington, quoted in Adams's Works, II. 303.

subsistence (sub-sis'tens), n. [= F. subsistence = Sp. Pg. subsistencia = It. sussistenza, < L. substantia, substance, reality, ML. also stability, < L. subsisten(t)-s, ppr. of subsistere, continue, subsist: see subsistent.] 1. Real being; actual existence.

Their difference from the Pharisees was about the future reward, which being denied, they by consequence of that error fell into the rest, to deny the Resurrection, the subsistence spiritually, &c. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 144.

2t. Continuance; continued existence.

This Liberty of the Subject concerns himself and the subsistence of his own regal power in the first place. Milton, Eikonoklastes, xxvii.

Subsistence is perpetual existence.

Scedenborg, Christian Psychol. (tr. by Gorman), p. 19.

3. That which exists or has real being.—4. The act or process of furnishing support to animal life, or that which is furnished; means of support; support; livelihood.

In China they speak of a Tree called Maguais, which affords not only good Drink, being pierced, but all Things else that belong to the subsistence of Man. Howell, Letters, ii. 54.

Those of the Hottentots that live by the Dutch Town have their greatest subsistence from the Dutch, for there is one or more of them belonging to every house. Dampier, Voyages, I. 540.

5. The state of being subsistent; inherence in something else; as, the subsistence of qualities in bodies.—Subsistence department, a military staff department in the United States army, which has charge of the purchase or procurement of all provisions for the supply of the army. Its chief officer is the commissary-general of subsistence, with the rank of brigadier-general.

—Subsistence diet, the lowest amount of food on which life can be supported in health.—Subsistence stores (milit.), the food-supplies procured and issued for the support of an army. The phrase also covers the grain, hay, straw, or other forage supplied for the sustenance and bedding of animals intended for slaughter in order to provide an army with fresh meat. = Syn. 4. Sustenance, etc. See living.

subsistency (sub-sis'ten-si), n. [As subsistence (see -cy).] Same as subsistence.

A great part of antiquity contented their hopes of subsistency with a transmigration of their souls.

Sir T. Browne.

We know as little how the union is dissolved that is the chain of these differing subsistencies that compound us, as how it first commenced. Glanville.

subsistent (sub-sis'tent), a. [= F. subsistant = Sp. Pg. subsistente = It. sussistente, < L. subsisten(t)-s, ppr. of subsistere, continue, subsist: see subsist.] 1. Continuing to exist; having existence; subsisting.

Such as deny there are spirits subsistent without bodies. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 10.

2. Inherent.

These qualities are not subsistent in those bodies, but are operations of fancy begotten in something else. Bentley.

subsistential (sub-sis'ten'shal), a. Pertaining to subsistence; especially, in theol., pertaining to the divine subsistence or essence.

Having spoken of the effects of the attributes of God's essence as such, we must next speak of the effects of his three great attributes which some call subsistential—that is, his omnipotency, understanding, and will. Baxter, Divine Life, i. 7.

subsister (sub-sis'ter), n. [< subsist + -er.] One who subsists; specifically, one who is supported by others; a poor prisoner.

Like a subsister in a gown of rugge rent on the left shoulder, to sit singing the counter-tenor by the cage in Southwark. Kind-Hart's Dream (1592). (Halliwell.)

subsizar (sub'si'zär), n. An under-sizar; a student of lower standing than a sizar. Also spelled subsizer.

Friar Bacon's subsizer is the greatest blockhead in all Oxford. Greene, Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay.

How lackeys and subsizers press

And scramble for degrees.

Bp. Corbet, Ans. to A Certain Poem.

subsoil (sub'soil), n. The under-soil: the bed or stratum of earth or earthy matter which lies immediately under the surface soil, and which is less finely disintegrated and contains less organic matter than that. When, as is often the case, it is densely compacted it becomes what is frequently called hard-pan. In agriculture a great deal depends on the character of the subsoil, more especially as to whether it does or does not permit water to pass through it.

Subsoil is the broken-up part of the rocks immediately under the soil. Its character of course is determined by that of the rock out of which it is formed by subaerial disintegration. A. Geikie, Encyc. Brit., X. 237.

Subsoil-plov. See plov.

subsoil (sub'soil), v. t. [< subsoil, n.] In agri., to employ the subsoil-plov upon; plow up so as to cut into the subsoil.

The farmer drains, irrigates, or subsoils portions of it. J. S. Mill.

subsoiler (sub'soi-lër), n. [< subsoil + -er.] One who or that which subsoils; an implement or part of an implement used in subsoiling. The Engineer, LXX. 472.

subsolar (sub-sô'lär), a. [< L. sub, under, + sol, the sun: see solar.] Being under the sun; terrestrial; specifically, being between the tropics. Fitzroy, Weather Book, p. 71.

subsolar (sub'sô-lä-ri), a. Same as subsolar.

The causes and effects of all Things done upon this subsolar ball.

A. Browne, Paraphrase on Eccles., i.

subsolid (sub-sol'id), n. A solid incompletely inclosed.

subspatulate (sub-spat'ü-lät), a. Nearly or somewhat spatulate.

subspecies (sub-spê'shëz), n.; pl. subspecies. [< NL. subspecies, < L. sub, under, + species, species.] In zool. and bot., a variety of a species; a climatic or geographical race recognizably different from another, yet not specifically distinguished; a conspecies. The nearest synonym is race. (See race, n., 5 (a) (b).) Subspecies is a stronger and stricter word than variety, though nearly synonymous with the latter in its biological sense; it means decidedly more than strain, sport, or breed in like senses. The interpretation of subspecies and their actual handling in zoological and botanical taxonomy have been much mooted. Such forms are commonly regarded as nascent or incipient species (see species, 5) which have acquired subspecific characters under varying conditions of environment, and whose specific invalidity is determinable by the fact of their intergradation. See intergrade, v.

Subspecific (sub-spê'sif'ik), a. Of the nature of a subspecies; not quite specific; conspecific. Subspecifically (sub-spê'sif'ik-äl-i), adv. As a subspecies. Fisheries of U. S., V. ii. 819.

subspheoidal (sub-sfê-noi'döl), a. Situated beneath or on the under side of the sphenoid. subsphere (sub'sfêr), n. A solid imperfectly or approximately spherical.

subspherical (sub-sfêr'ik-äl), a. Imperfectly spherical; of a form approaching that of a sphere.

Subspherically (sub-sfêr'ik-äl-i), adv. In the form of a subsphere. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLIV. 150.

spinous (sub-spî'nus), a. 1. Somewhat spinous or prickly; like a spine to some extent; as, spinous hairs in the pelage of a mammal.

—2. Situated under (ventrad of) the spinal column; hypaxial with reference to the backbone; subvertebral.—3. Situated or occurring below, beneath, or on the under side of a spine, as (1) of a vertebra, or (2) of the scapula: infrapinous; as, a spinous muscle (the infrapinatus).

—Spinous dislocation of the humerus, a dislocation in which the head of the humerus rests beneath the spine of the scapula.—Spinous fossa, the fossa below the spine of the scapula; the infrapinous fossa.

subspiral (sub-spî'ral), a. Somewhat spiral; especially, in conch., noting the opercula of some shells which are faintly or indistinctly marked on one side with a spiral line, or this line itself. See cut under operculum.

subsplenial (sub-splê'ni-äl), a. Situated under the splenium of the corpus callosum; noting certain cerebral gyres.

subst. An abbreviation of (a) substantive and (b) substitute.

substage (sub'stāj), n. An attachment to the compound microscope, placed beneath the ordinary stage, and used to support the achromatic condenser, the polarizing prism, etc. It is usually arranged with a rack-and-pinion movement, centering screws, etc., by which the position may be adjusted; and in the substage there is an arched arm upon which the support holding the condenser can be moved, so as to give very oblique illumination when desired.

substalagmite (sub-stā-lag'mit), n. A name used by Nelson for the compact deposit of carbonate of lime, without crystalline structure, filling crevices in the soft calcareous sandstone of Bermuda. Similar deposits when crystalline are called by him stalagmite. Trans. Geol. Soc. London, 1849, V. 106.

substalagmitic (sub-stal-ag-mit'ik), a. [< substalagmite + -ic.] Relating to or consisting of substalagmite. Darwin, Geol. Observations, I. vii. 162.

substance (sub'stans), n. [< ME. substance, substantia, < OF. substantia, substantia, F. substance = Sp. substancia, sustancia = Pg. substancia = It. sustanza, sustanza, < L. substantia, being, essence, material, < substau(t)-s, ppr. of substare, stand under or among, being present, hold out, < sub, under, + stare, stand; see stand.] 1. That which exists by itself, and in which accidents inhere; that which receives modifications, and is not itself a mode; that which corresponds, in the reality of things, to the subject in logic. Aristotle and Kant agree in making the conception of substance essentially the same as that of a subject of predication. But it is difficult to find a property by which substances may be recognized; for the above definition seems to afford none. Many philosophers hold that whatever is perdurable is substance. This, however, would include mechanical energy. Indeed, since every physical law can be stated in the form of an equation, and since that equation must have a constant term, it follows that every absolute uniformity of nature must consist in the perdurability of some quantity. Aristotle makes substances proper, called first substances, to be things individual; but this comports with few philosophical systems. Thus, in the medieval development of Aristotelianism, scientific propositions were regarded as universal statements concerning natures, so that the true subjects, or substances, were universal. Moreover, to make individuality the criterion of substance would seem to make space, as the source of individuality, the only first substance. At any rate, under that view, spatial positions would be substances in a preeminent sense. Others, remarking that the parts of space are not distinct in themselves, apart from their relations to material things, make self-existence, or the being distinct from all other things, not by virtue of modifications or characters, but by the thing's own nature, or arbitrary extrusion of itself, to be the chief mark of a substance, which would thus be most simply defined as an independent entity. Substance and essence are nearly synonymous, except that the latter cannot appropriately be used to designate an individual and lifeless thing.

They add . . . that as he [Christ] coupled the substance of his flesh and the substance of bread together, so we together should receive both. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 67.

Since the substance of your perfect self

Is else devoted, I am but a shadow;

And to your shadow will I make true love.

Shak., T. G. of V., iv. 2. 124.

A substance is a being subsisting of itself and subject to accidents. To subsist by itself is nothing else than not to be in anything as in a subject; and it agrees to all substances, even to God, but to be subject to accidents only to finite; for God is not subject to accidents. Substance is either first or second. The first is a singular substance, or that which is not said of a subject, as Alexander, Bucephalus. The second is that which is said of a subject, as man, horse. For man is said of Alexander and Philip, and horse of Bucephalus and Cyllarus. Burgesdieu, tr. by a Gentleman, i. 4.

I confess there is another idea which would be of general use for mankind to have, as it is of general talk as if they had it; and that is the idea of substance, which we neither have, nor can have, by sensation or reflection. If nature took care to provide us any ideas, we might well expect they should be such as by our own faculties we cannot procure to ourselves; but we see on the contrary that since by those ways whereby our ideas are brought into our minds this is not, we have no such clear idea at all, and therefore signify nothing by the word substance but only an uncertain supposition of we know not what, i. e., of some thing whereof we have no particular distinct positive idea, which we take to be the substratum, or support, of those ideas we do know. Had the poor Indian philosopher (who imagined that the earth also wanted something to bear it up) but thought of this word substance, he needed not to have been at the trouble to find an elephant to support it, and a tortoise to support his elephant; the word substance would have done it effectually. And he that inquired might have taken it for as good an answer from an Indian philosopher, that substance, without knowing what it is, is that which supports the earth, as we take it for a sufficient answer and good doctrine from our European philosophers that substance, without knowing what it is, is that which supports accidents. So that of substance we have no idea of what it is, but only a confused obscure one of what it does.

Locke, Human Understanding, I. 4, § 18, and ii. 13, § 19.

Substance, if we leave out the sensuous condition of permanence, would mean nothing but a something that may be conceived as a subject, without being the predicate of anything else.

Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Muller, II. 130.

2. The real or essential part; the essence.

And wel I woot the substance is in me,

If any thing shal wel reported be.

Chaucer, Prolog. to Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 37.

Miserable bigots . . . who hate sects and parties different from their own more than they love the substance of religion. Burke, Rev. in France.

At the close of the [seventeenth] century, . . . the sovereign retained the shadow of that authority of which the Tudors had held the substance.

Macaulay, Sir William Temple.

All the forms are fugitive,

But the substances survive.

Emerson, Woodnotes, ii.

3. In theol., the divine being or essence, common to the three persons of the Trinity.

One Lord Jesus Christ, . . . being of one substance with the Father.
Nicene Creed.

4†. The character of being a substance, in sense 1; substantiality.

Thou ground of our substance.

Continue on us thy piteous eye deere.

Chaucer, A. B. C., l. 87.

5. The meaning expressed by any speech or writing, or the purport of any action, as contradistinguished from the mode of expression or performance.

With ther powre and all ther hoole puyssaunce.

Gower, E. E. T. S., l. 1968.

Unto your grace do I in chief address

The substance of my speech.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. l. 32.

It seems swearing of Fealty was with the Scots but a ceremony without Substance, as good as nothing.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 97.

6. Substantiation; that which establishes or gives firm support.

Faith is the substance (margin, ground of confidence) [assurance (margin, giving substance to), R. V.] of things hoped for.

Heb. xi. 1.

7. Any particular kind of corporeal matter; stuff; material; part; body; specifically, a chemical species.

Sir, there she stands.

If aught within that little seeming substance

. . . may fitly like your grace.

She's there, and she is yours. Shak., Lear, l. 1. 201.

All of one nature, of one substance bred.

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., l. 1. 11.

Books are as meats and viands are, some of good, some of evil substance.

Milton, Areopagitica, p. 16.

It [chemistry] tells us that everything which exists here is really made up of one or more of only sixty-three different things; that the whole of the animal kingdom, the vegetable kingdom, the mineral kingdom, is made up of only sixty-three different substances.

J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 166.

8. Wealth; means; good estate; as, a man of substance.

His substance also was seven thousand sheep, and three thousand camels.

Job i. 3.

Seen from the surface, it is the locus ceruleus. — Substantia gelatinosa centralis, the neuroglia which backs the layer of columnar epithelial cells lining the central canal of the spinal cord. — Substantia gelatinosa posterior or Rolandi, a part of the caput of the posterior cornu of gray matter of the spinal cord, near the tip of that cornu, having a peculiar semitransparent appearance. Also called formatio gelatinosa Rolandi. — Substantia nigra, a region, marked by dark pigmented cells, separating the crista from the tegmentum of the crus cerebri. Also called substantia nigra Soemmeringii, stratum nigrum, stratum intermedium, and locus niger. — Substantia reticularis. Same as reticular formatio (which see, under reticular). — Substantia spongiosa, that part of the gray matter of the spinal cord which is not substantia gelatinosa centralis or posterior.

substantial (sub-stan'shal), a. and n. [< ME.

substantial, < OF. substantiel, F. substantiel = Sp. Pg. substancial = It. sostanziale, < l. sub- stantialis, of or pertaining to the substance, essential, < substantia, substance, material; see substance.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of substance; being a substance; real; actually existing; true; actual; not seeming or imaginary; not illusive.

If this Atheist would have his chance or fortune to be a real and substantial agent, as the vulgar seem to have commonly apprehended, . . . he is . . . more stupid and more supinely ignorant than those vulgar.

Bentley, Eight Boyle Lectures, v.

All this is but a dream,

Too flattering-sweet to be substantial.

Shak., R. and J., ii. 2. 141.

The sun appears to be flat as a plate of silver . . . the moon appears to be as big as the sun, and the rainbow appears to be a large substantial arch in the sky; all which are in reality gross fables.

Watts, Logic, Int.

2. Having essential value; genuine; sound; sterling.

The matter of the point controverted is great, but it is driven to an over-great subtlety and obscurity, so that it becometh a thing rather ingenious than substantial.

Lucan, Unity in Religion (ed. 1887).

This he looks upon to be sound learning and substantial criticism.

Addison, Tatler, No. 158.

3. Having firm or good material; strong; stout; solid; as, substantial cloth.

Most ponderous and substantial things.

Shak., M. for M., iii. 2. 200.

There are, by the direction of the Lawgiver, certain good and substantial steps placed even through the very midst of this slough [of Despond].

Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, i.

4. Possessed of considerable substance, goods, or estate; moderately wealthy; well-to-do.

She has, 'mongst others, two substantial suitors.

Middleton, The Widow, l. 2.

Pray take all the care you can to inquire into the value, and set it at the best rate to substantial people.

Swift, To Dr. Sheridan, June 29, 1725.

5. Real or true in the main or for the most part; as, substantial success.

Substantial agreement between all as to the points discussed.

The Century, XXXIX. 563.

6. Of considerable amount; as, a substantial gift; substantial profit. — 7†. Capable of being substantiated or proved.

It is substantial;

For, that disguise being on him which I wore,
It will be thought I, which he calls the Pandar,
Did kil the Duke and fled away in his apparel,
Leaving him so disguis'd to avoid swift pursuit.
C. Tourneur, Revenger's Tragedy, iv. 2.

8. Vital; important.

Christes church can neuer ere in any substancial point that God would haue vs bounden to beleue.

Sir T. More, Works, p. 163.

9. In law, pertaining to or involving the merits or essential right, in contradistinction to questions of form or manner. Thus, a substantial performance of a contract is one which fulfils reasonably well all the material and essential stipulations, though it may be deficient in respect of punctuality or departure from minor details of manner for which moderate deductions from the price would compensate. So, in litigation, the right of trial by jury is a substantial right, but the order in which evidence shall be adduced is not.

10. Pertaining to the substance or tissue of any part or organ.

Transition from substantial to membranous parietes.

Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VIII. 120.

Substantial being, division, form, mode, etc. See the nouns.

II. n. 1. That which has a real existence; that which has substance. — 2. That which has real practical value.

A large and well filled basket . . . contained substantials and delicacies . . . especially helpful.

New York Evangelist, Dec. 2, 1886.

3. An essential part.

Although a custom introduced against the substantials of an appeal be not valid, as that it should not be appealed to a superior but to an inferior judge, yet a custom may be introduced against the accidentals of an appeal.

Ayliffe, Parergon.

substantialia (sub-stan'shi-ä'li-ä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of l. substantialis; see substantial.]

In Schools law, those parts of a deed which are essential to its validity as a formal instrument.

substantialism (sub-stan'shal-izm), n. The doctrine that behind phenomena there are substantial realities, or real substances, whether mental or corporeal.

substantialist (sub-stan'shal-ist), n. One who adheres to the doctrine of substantialism.

Philosophers, as they affirm or deny the authority of consciousness in guaranteeing a substratum or substance to the manifestations of the ego and non-ego, are divided into realists or substantialists and into nihilists or non-substantialists.

Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph. xvi.

substantiality (sub-stan'shi-ä'l-i-ti), n. [< F. substantiälité = It. sostanzialità, < l. substan- tiälitātis, the quality of being substantial or essential, < substantialis, substantial; see substantial.] 1. The character of being substantial, in any sense; the having of the function of a substance in upholding accidents.

The soul is a stranger to such gross substantiality.

Glaucarde, Vanity of Beguiling, iv.

Many of the lower animal-build themselves dwellings that excel in substantiality . . . the huts or hovels of men. Zoology, Mind in the Lower Animals, l. 113. (Emerson, Diet.)

We understand his lordship very well; he means a particular providence and a future state, the moral attributes of the Deity and the substantiality of the soul.

Warburton, Bodingbrooke's Philosophy, iii.

2. Substance; essence.

I shall know whether all souls came from Adam's own substantiality, and whether there be more substance in all than in that one.

Lockyer, Dying Thoughts.

substantialize (sub-stan'shal-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. substantialized, ppr. substantializing. [< substantial + -ize.] To render substantial; give reality to.

I liked well to see that strange life, which even the stout dead-in-earnest little Bohemian musicians, piping in the centre of the Piazza, could not altogether substantialize.

Hovells, Venetian Life, iv.

substantially (sub-stan'shal-i), adv. 1. In the manner of a substance; with reality of existence; truly; really; effectually.

In him all his Father shone

Substantially express'd. Milton, P. L. iii. 110.

Be substantially great in thyself, and more than thou appearest unto others.

Sir T. Browne, Christ, Mor., l. 19.

2. In a substantial manner; strongly; solidly.

To know . . . what good laws are wanting, and how to frame them substantially, that good Men may enjoy the freedom which they merit.

Milton, Hist. Eng., iii.

Pleasing myself in my own house and manner of living more than ever I did, by seeing how much better and more substantially I live than others do.

Pope's Diary, l. 421.

3. In substance; in the main; essentially; by including the material or essential part; as, the two arguments are substantially the same.

A king with a life revenue and an unchecked power of exacting money from the rich is substantially an absolute sovereign.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., s. 373.

substantialness (sub-stan'shal-ness), n. The state or quality of being substantial, in any sense.

substantiate (sub-stan'shi-ät), v. t.; pret. and pp. substantiated, ppr. substantiating. [< ML. substantiatus, ppr. of substantiare (< It. sostanziare, sostanziare = Sp. Pg. substanciar).] 1. To make to exist; make real or actual.

The accidental of any act is said to be whatever advenes to the act itself already substantiated.

Ayliffe, Parergon.

2. To establish by proof or competent evidence; verify; make good; as, to substantiate a charge or an allegation; to substantiate a declaration.

Observation is in turn wanted to direct and substantiate the course of experiment.

Cideridge.

3. To present as having substance; body forth. Every man feels for himself, and knows how he is affected by particular qualities in the persons he admires, the impressions of which are too minute and delicate to be substantiated in language.

Boswell, Johnson, l. 129.

As many thoughts in succession substantiate themselves, we shall by and by stand in a new world of our own creation.

Emerson, Friendship.

substantiation (sub-stan'shi-ä'shon), n. [< substantiate + -ion.] The act of substantiating or giving substance to anything; the act of proving; evidence; proof.

This substantiation of shadows,

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 82.

The fact as claimed will find lasting substantiation.

The American, VIII. 379.

substantial (sub-stan'shi-äl or sub'stan-ti-äl), a. [< l. substantialis, substantial; see substantive.] 1. Pertaining to or having the character of a substantive.

There remain several substantial and verbal formations for which a satisfactory explanation was not reached.

Amer. Jour. Philol., vi. 430.

2. Independent or self-dependent.

The real is individual, self-existent, substantial.

Maud, IX. 128.

1. substantivum, se. nomen, an adjective name, a noun, adjective (an adjective), the name of an adjective. [I. a. 1. Betokening or expressing existence; as, the substantive verb.—2. Depending on itself; independent; self-dependent; hence, individual.

He considered how sufficient and substantive this land was to maintain itself, without any aid of the foreigner.

Bacon

Many . . . thought it a pity that so substantive and rare a creature should . . . be only known . . . as a wife and mother

George Eliot, Middlemarch, Finale.

3. Substantial; solid; enduring; firm; permanent; real.

The trait which is truly most worthy of note in the politics of Homeric Greece is . . . the substantive weight and influence which belonged to speech as an instrument of government.

Gliddone, Studies on Homer (ed. 1858), III. 102.

As to . . . the substantive value of historical training, opinions will still differ.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 35.

All this shows that he [Racine] had already acquired some repute as a promising novice in letters, though he had as yet done nothing substantive. Encyc. Brit., XX. 204.

4. Independent; not to be inferred from something else, but itself explicitly and formally expressed.

She [Elizabeth] then, by a substantive enactment, declaring her governorship of the Church.

Nineteenth Century, XXVI. 891.

The decisions of the chair . . . could be brought before the House only by way of a substantive motion, liable to amendment and after due notice.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX. 265.

5. In gram., of the nature of a noun, usable as subject or object of a verb and in other noun constructions: as, a substantive word; a substantive pronoun; a substantive clause.—Substantive colors, colors which, in the process of dyeing, become fixed or permanent without the intervention of other substances, in distinction from adjective colors, which require the aid of mordants to fix them.—Substantive law. See law.—Substantive verb, the verb to be.

II. n. 1. In gram., a noun; a part of speech that can be used as subject or as object of a verb, be governed by a preposition, or the like. The term noun, in older usage, included both the "noun-substantive" and the "noun-adjective": it is now much more common to call the two respectively the substantive, or the noun simply, and the adjective. See noun. Abbreviated s., subst.

2†. An independent thing or person.

Every thing is a total or substantive in itself.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

K. John, being a Substantive of himself, hath a Device in his Head to make his Subjects as willing to give him Money as he was to have it.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 70.

substantive (sub'stan-tiv), v. t.; pret. and pp. substantived, ppr. substantivizing. [< substantive, n.] To convert into or use as a substantive. [Rare.]

Wherefore we see that the word ἐκκλῆσιον, as to its grammatical form, is not a diminutive, as some have conceived, but an adjective substantivized, as well as τοῦτο is.

Cutworth, Intellectual System, p. 264.

substantively (sub'stan-tiv-ly), adv. 1. In a substantive manner; in substance; essentially: as, a thing may be apparently one thing and substantively another.—2. In gram., as a substantive or noun: as, an adjective or a pronoun used substantively.

substantiveness (sub'stan-tiv-ness), n. The state of being substantive. J. H. Newman, Development of Christ. Doct., i. § 1. [Rare.]

substantivize (sub'stan-tiv-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. substantivized, ppr. substantivizing. [< substantive + -ize.] To make a substantive of; use as a substantive.

Perhaps we have here the forerunners of the substantivized être, pouvoir, vouloir, savoir, etc.

Amer. Jour. Philol., VIII. 104.

substation (sub'stā'shən), n. A subordinate station: as, a police substation.

substernal (sub'stér-nal), a. Situated beneath the sternum; lying under the breast-bone.

substyle, n. See substyle.

substitute (sub'sti-tūt), v. t.; pret. and pp. substituted, ppr. substituting. [< L. substitutus, pp. of substituere (> lt. substituire = Sp. sustituir = Pg. substituir = F. substituer), place under or next to, put instead of, substitute, < sub, under, + statuere, set up, station, cause to stand: see statute. Cf. constitute, institute.] 1. To put in the place of another; put in exchange.

For real wit he is obliged to substitute vivacity.

Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 1.

2†. To appoint; invest with delegated authority.

But who is substituted 'gainst the French

1 have no certain notice.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., i. 3. 84.

Their request being effected, he substituted Mr. Scrivenor his dearest friend in the Presidency.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, i. 180.

Substituted service. See service.

substitute (sub'sti-tūt), a. and n. [< F. substitut = Pr. substitut = Sp. Pg. substituto = It. sostituto (= D. substituit = G. Sw. Dan. substitut, n.), < L. substitutus, pp. of substituere, substitute: see substitute, v.] 1. a. Put in the place or performing the functions of another; substituted.

It may well happen that this pope may be deposed, & another substitute in his room.

Sir T. More, Works, p. 1427.

II. n. 1. A person put in the place of another; one acting for or in the room of another; theat., an understudy; specifically (milit.), one who for a consideration serves in an army or navy in the place of a conscript; also, a thing serving the purpose of another.

That controlled self-consciousness of manner which is the expensive substitute for simplicity.

George Eliot, Middlemarch, liii.

2. In calico-printing, a solution of phosphate of soda and phosphate of lime with a little glue or other form of gelatin, used as a substitute for cow-dung.—Substitutes in an entail, in law, those heirs who are called to the succession on the failure of others.—Syn. 1. Proxy, alternate.

substitution (sub'sti-tū'shən), n. [< F. substitution = Sp. sustitucion = Pg. substituição = It. sostituzione, < L. substitutio], a putting in place of another, substitution, [< substiture, pp. substitutus, substitute: see substitute, v.] 1. The act of substituting, or putting (one person or thing) in the place of another; also, the state or fact of being substituted.

We can perceive, from the records of the Hellenic and Latin city communities, that there, and probably over a great part of the world, the substitution of common territory for common race as the basis of national reunion was slow.

Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 75.

2. The office of a substitute; delegated authority. [Rare.]

He did believe

He was indeed the duke; out of the substitution,

And executing the outward face of royalty.

With all prerogative. Shak., Tempest, i. 2. 103.

3. In gram., the use of one word for another; syllepsis.—4. In Rom. law, the effect of appointing a person to be heir, in case the heir first nominated would not or could not be heir. This was called rudgar substitution. Pupillary substitution existed where, after instituting his child as heir, the testator directed that, if after the child should have become heir it should die before attaining puberty, another be substituted in its place. This was originally allowed only for children under age in the power of the testator, but was afterward extended to children who for any reason could not make a valid will.

5. In French law, a disposition of property whereby the person receiving it, who is called the institute (le grévé), is charged either at his death or at some other time to deliver it over to another person called the substitute (l'appelé).

6. In chem., the replacing of one or more elements or radicals in a compound by other elements or radicals. Thus, by bringing water and potassium together, potassium (K) is substituted for a hydrogen atom in water (H₂O), yielding KOH, or caustic potash. By further action the other hydrogen atom may be replaced, yielding potassium oxide (K₂O). Substitution is the principal method employed in examining the chemical structure of organic bodies. Also called metalepsy.

No generalization has, perhaps, so extensively contributed to the progress made by organic chemistry during the last fifteen years as the doctrine of substitution.

E. Frankland, Exper. in Chem., p. 210.

7. In alg.: (a) The act of replacing a quantity by another equal to it; also, in the language of some algebraists, the replacement of a set of variables by another set connected with the first by a system of equations equal in number to the number of variables in each set. See transformation (which is the better term). (b) The operation of changing the order of a finite number of objects, generally letters, that are in a row, the change following a rule according to which the object in each place is carried to some definite place in the row. This operation being regarded as itself a subject of algebraical operations. For example, supposing we were to start with the row a, b, c, d, e, a substitution might consist in carrying us to the row b, c, a, d, e. Denoting this substitution by s, the repetition of it, which would be denoted by s², would carry us to c, a, b, d, e. If T denote the substitution of d, e, c, b for a, b, c, d, e, then Ts would convert the last row into d, e, a, c, b, while ST would convert it into d, e, c, a, b. One way of denoting a substitution to which the terminology of the theory refers is to write a row up-on which the substitution could operate, with the resulting row above it. These two rows are called the terms of the substitution, the upper one the numerator, the lower the denominator of the substitution. The objects constituting the rows are called the letters of the substitution.—Associate substitution, one of two substitutions interchangeable with the same substitution.—Bifid substitution. See bifid.—Circular factors of a substitution, circular substitutions whose product constitutes the substitution spoken of, it being understood that no two of these affect the positions of the same letters.—Circular substitution, a substitution whose successive powers carry the letters which it displaces round in one cycle.—Cremona substitution, a substitution of a Cremona transformation, especially of a quadratic transformation.—Derivative substitution, a substitution whose inverse multiplied by another substitution, and then this product by the derivative substitution itself, makes a substitution the derivative of that other substitution.—Derivate of a substitution, the product of three substitutions, of which the middle one is the substitution spoken of, while the other two are inverse substitutions.—Determinant of a linear substitution. See determinant.—Doctrine of substitution, in theol., the doctrine that Christ suffered vicariously, as a substitute for the sinner.—Elementary substitution, a substitution into which only the elements a, b, c, d, e enter.—Identical substitution, a substitution which leaves the order of all the letters unchanged.

—Imprimitive substitution, a substitution not primitive.—Index of a system of conjugate substitutions, the quotient of the number of permutations of the letters by the order of the system.—Interchangeable substitutions, two substitutions which give the same product in whichever order they are multiplied—that is, whichever is taken first in forming the product.—Inverse substitutions, two substitutions whose product is an identical substitution.—Isomorphous substitution group, one of two groups of substitutions such that every substitution of the one corresponds to a single substitution of the other, and every product of two substitutions to a product of analogous substitutions.—Linear substitution. (a) A circular substitution between a variable, a linear function of it, and the successive iterations of that function. (b) A linear transformation.—Order of a substitution, that power of a substitution which is an identical substitution.—Order of a system of conjugate substitutions, the number of substitutions belonging to the system.—Orthogonal substitution. See orthogonal.—Permutable substitutions, interchangeable substitutions.—Power of a substitution, the operation which consists in the repetition of the substitution spoken of as many times as the exponent of the power indicates.—Primitive substitution, a substitution whose order is a prime number or a power of a prime number.—Product of two substitutions, the result of performing two substitutions successively upon one row.—Rational substitution, a circular substitution between successive iterations of a rational function, such as $xm + 1 = (axm - b) / (cxm + d)$.—Reduced substitution, a substitution represented by an integral algebraic function having 1 for the coefficient of the highest power of the variable, and 0 for the coefficient of the next highest power and for the absolute term.—Regular substitution, a substitution whose circular factors are all of the same order.—Service by substitution. See substituted service, under service.—Similar substitutions, two substitutions which have the same number of circular factors and the same number of letters in the cycles.—Substitution product, a chemical compound prepared by substituting an element or radical for some member of a complex molecule without altering the rest of the molecule.—System of conjugate substitutions, a group of substitutions—that is to say, such a collection of substitutions that every product of substitutions belonging to it is itself a substitution of the same collection.—Term of a substitution, one of the two permutations whose relation constitutes the substitution.

substitutional (sub'sti-tū'shən-al), a. [< substitution + -al.] Pertaining to or implying substitution; supplying, or capable of supplying, the place of another. Imp. Dict.

substitutionally (sub'sti-tū'shən-al-i), adv. In a substitutional manner; by way of substitution. Eccl. Rev.

substitutionary (sub'sti-tū'shən-ā-ri), a. [< substitution + -ary.] Relating to or making substitution; substitutional.

The mediation of Christ in what may . . . be called his substitutionary relation to men. Prog. Orthodoxy, p. 52.

substitutive (sub'sti-tū-tiv), a. [< LL. substitutus, conditional, < L. substitutus, pp. of substituere, substitute: see substitute.] Tending to afford or furnish a substitute; making substitution; capable of being substituted. Bp. Wilkins.

subtract (sub-strakt'), v. t. An erroneous form of subtract, common in vulgar use. Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 469.

subtraction (sub-strak'shən), n. An erroneous form of subtraction.

subtractor (sub-strak'tor), n. An erroneous form of subtractor, subtractor: used in the quotation in the sense of 'detractor.'

By this hand they are scondrels and subtractors.

Shak., T. N., i. 3. 37.

substrate (sub'strāt), n. [< NL. substratum.] A substratum.

Albert and Aquinas agree in declaring that the principle of individuation is to be found in matter—not, however, in matter as a formless substrate, but in determinate matter (materia signata), which is explained to mean matter quantitatively determined in certain respects.

Encyc. Brit., XXI. 428

substrate (sub'strāt), v. t. [< L. substratus, pp. of substernere, strew or spread under, < sub, under, + sternere, spread, extend, scatter: see stratum.] To strew or lay under anything.

The melted glass being supported by the substrated ssnd. Boyle, Works, II. 222.

substrator (sub-strā'tor), n. [< L. substratus, pp. of substruere, spread under: see substrate.] Same as kursler, 2.

The mourners or weepers, the hearers, the substrators, and the co-standers. Biagham, Antiquities, XVIII. i. 1.

substratum (sub-strā'tum), n.; pl. substrata (-tā). [NL., < L. substratum, neut. of substratus, spread under: see substrate, and cf. stratum.] 1. That which is laid or spread under; a stratum lying under another: in agri., the subsoil; hence, anything which underlies or supports: as, a substratum of truth.

In the living body we observe a number of activities of its material substratum, by which the series of phenomena spoken of as life are conditioned. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (Trans.), p. 13.

2. In metaph., substance, or matter, as that in which qualities inhere.

We acustom ourselves to suppose some substratum wherein they [simple ideas] do subsist, and from whence they do result; which therefore we call substance. Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxiii., note A.

substriate (sub-strī'āt), a. In entom., having indistinct or imperfect striae.

substruct (sub-strukt'), v. t. [< L. substructus, pp. of substruere, build beneath, underbuild, < sub, under, + struere, pile up, erect, build: see structure.] To place beneath as a foundation; build beneath something else. [Rare.] substruction (sub-struk'shon), n. [< F. substruction = Pg. substrucção, < L. substructio(n), an underbuilding, a foundation, < substruere, build beneath: see substruct.] An underbuilding; a mass of building below another; a foundation.

It is a magnificent, strong building, with a substruction very remarkable. Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 8, 1644.

substructure (sub'strukt'ūr), a. [< substructure + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of a substructure.

substructure (sub'strukt'ūr), n. [< substruct + -ure; cf. structure.] A substruction; any under-structure; a foundation.

substylar (sub'stī'lār), a. [< substyle + -ar.] 3. Of, pertaining to, or consisting of the substyle.

substyle (sub'stīl), n. In dialing, the line on which the style or gnomon stands, formed by the intersection of the face of the dial with the plane which passes through the gnomon.

subsublative (sub-sul'tiv), a. [< L. subsublatus, pp. of subsublato, leap up, < sub, under, + sublato, leap, spring: see salient. (cf. L. subsublimis, with leaps or jumps.) Moving by sudden leaps or starts; making short bounds; spasmodic.

The earth, I was told, moved up and down like the boiling of a pot. . . . This sort of subsublative motion is ever accounted the most dangerous. Bp. Berkeley, Works (ed. 1754), I. 81.

subsublatory (sub-sul'tō-ri-lī), adv. In a subsublatory or bounding manner; by leaps, starts, or twitches. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 326.

subsublatory (sub-sul'tō-ri-lī), a. [As subsublative + -ory.] Same as subsublative. De Quincy, Style, i.

subsublatus (sub-sul'tus), n.; pl. subsublatus. [NL., < L. subsublatus, pp. subsublatus, leap up: see subsublative.] A twitching, jerky, or convulsive movement.—Subsublatus clonus. Same as subsublatus tendinum.—Subsublatus tendinum, a twitching of the tendons, observed in many cases of low fevers, etc.: it is a grave symptom.

subsume (sub-sūm'), v. t.; pret. and pp. subsumed, pp. subsuming. [*< NL. subsumere, < L. sub, under, + sumere, take: see assume.] In logic, to state (a case) under a general rule; instance (an object or objects) as belonging to a class under consideration. Especially, when the major proposition of a syllogism is first stated, the minor proposition is said to be subsumed under it. Modern writers often use the word in the sense of stating that the object of the verb belongs under a class, even though that class be not already mentioned.

St. Paul, who cannot name that word "sinners" but must straight subsume in a parenthesis "of whom I am the chief." Hammond, Works, IV. viii.

Its business [that of the understanding] is to judge or subsume different conceptions or perceptions under more general conceptions that connect them together. E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 202.

subsumption (sub-sūmp'shon), n. [*< NL. subsumptio(n), < *subsumere, pp. subsumptus, subsume: see subsume.] 1. The act of subsuming; the act of mentioning as an instance of a rule or an example of a class; the act of including under something more general (and, in the strict use of the word, something already considered), as a particular under a universal, or a species under a genus.

The first act of consciousness was a subsumption of that of which we were conscious under this notion. Sir W. Hamilton.

2. That which is subsumed; the minor premise of a syllogism, when stated after the major premise.

Thus, if one were to say, "No man is wise in all things," and another to respond, "But you are a man," this proposition is a subsumption under the former.

Fleming, Vocab. Philos.

Twenty time yswounded hath she thanne.

Chaucer, Good Women, l. 1341.

My noble father, . . .
Flying for succor to his servant.

Shak., Hen. VIII., II. 1. 109.

She . . . knew them all, had studied their wants, had again and again felt in what way they might best be succored, could the means of succor only be found.

Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, xiv.

2. The person or thing that brings relief; especially, troops serving as an aid or assistance.

Than com the socours on bothe sides, and ther be-gan the bataile a-bowte Gawein fell and longe lastinge.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), II. 198.

The levied succours that should lend him aid.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., IV. 4. 23.

Take up the bodies: mourn in heart, my friends;
You have lost two noble succours; follow me.

Flower, Double Marriage, v. 2.

Soche was the a-vision that I saugh in my slepe.
Melvin (L. E. T. S.), iii. 632.
 In China they have a holy kind of Liquor made of such sort of Flowers for ratifying and binding of Bargains.
Howell, Letters, ii. 54.

 Too dounce and synge and othre suche.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 50.
 In it he melted lead for bullets
 To shoot at foes and sometimes pullets,
 To whom he bore so fell a grutch,
 He ne'er gave quarter t' any such.
S. Butler, Hindbars, I. i. 358.
 Witty men are apt to imagine they are agreeable as such.
Steele, Spectator, No. 386.

4. Some; certain: used to indicate or suggest a person or thing originally specified by a name or designation for which the speaker, for reasons of brevity, of convenience or reserve, or from forgetfulness, prefers to substitute, or must substitute, a general phrase: often repeated, such or such, or such and such (even with a single subject, but in this case implying repetition of action or selection of instances).

News then was brought unto the king
 That there was sicke a won as hee.
Johnie Armitrang (Child's Ballads, VI. 251).
 She complaineth of him that, not contented to take the wheate, the bacon, the butter, the oyle, the cheese, to give unto such and such out of y^e doores, but also steleth from her, to give unto his minion, that which she spineth at the rock. Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 310.
 I have appointed my servants to such and such a place.
 I Sam. xxi. 2.

 Is new arriv'd.
Daniel, Civil Wars, iii.
 In the mean time, those [conditions in life] of husband, wife, parent, child, master, servant, citizen of such or such a city, natural-born subject of such or such a country, may answer the purpose of examples.
Bentham, Introduct. to Morals and Legislation, xvi. 11.
 From the earliest times we hear of the king of such and such a province, the arch-king of all Ireland, the kings of Orkney and Man, even kings of Dublin.
The Century, XL. 295.

As such. See def. 3.—Never such. See never.—Such like. See like, 2. a.

II. pron. 1. Such a person or thing; more commonly with a plural reference, such persons or things: by ellipsis of the noun.

Such as sit in darkness and in the shadow of death.
 Ps. cvii. 10.

2. The same.

I bring you smiles of pity, not affection;
 For such she sent.
Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, i. 1.

Suchospondylia (sū'kō-spon-dil'i-ä), n. pl.
 [NL., < Gr. σώχος, the crocodile, + σπονδύλιον, a vertebra: see spondyli.] One of the major groups into which Reptilia (except Pleurospen- dylia) are divisible, characterized by having upon the anterior dorsal vertebrae long and divided transverse processes, the divisions of these with which the tubercles of the ribs articulate being longer than those with which the heads of the ribs articulate. The group contains the existing order Crocodylia, and the fossil orders Dicynodontia, Oraithoscelida, and Pterosauria, which are collectively thus distinguished on the one hand from Herpetospondylia and on the other from Pterospondylia.
 See these words, and Pleurospendylia.

suchospondylia (sū'kō-spon-dil'i-ä), a. [Suchospondylia
 + -ia.] Having a crocodilian conformation of the vertebrae with regard to the articulation of the ribs, in consequence of the occurrence of long divided transverse processes of the vertebrae; pertaining to the Suchospon- dylia, or having their characters.

suchospondylous (sū'kō-spon-di-lus), a. [As Suchospondylia + -ous.] Same as suchospon- dylian.

 the mouth by action of the lips and tongue which produces a partial vacuum.

The milk thou suck'dst from her did turn to marble.
Shak., Tit. And., ii. 3. 144.

The bee and the spider suck Honey and Poison out of one Flower.
Howell, Letters, iii. 4.

2. To draw something from with the mouth;
 specifically, to draw milk from.

A certain woman . . . lifted up her voice, and said unto him, blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps which thou hast sucked.
 Luke xi. 27.

Did a child suck every day a new nurse, I make account it would be no more unfrighted with the change of faces at six months old than at sixty. Locke, Education, § 115.

Some (bees) watch the food, some in the meadows ply,
 Taste every bud, and suck each blossom dry.
Addison, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, iv.

3. To draw in or imbibe by any process; inhale; absorb: usually with in, out, away, etc.:
 as, to suck in air; a sponge sucks in water.

Wise Dara's province, year by year,
 Like a great sponge, sucked wealth and plenty up.
Lowell, Dara.

4. To draw or drain.

Old ocean too suck'd through the porous globe.
Thomson, Autumn, l. 770.

5. To draw in, as a whirlpool; swallow up; in-gulf.

As waters are by whirlpools sucked and drawn. Dryden.

Thus far no suspicion has been suffered to reach the disciple that he is now rapidly approaching to a torrent that will suck him into a new faith.
De Quincy, Essenes, iii.

6†. To draw in or obtain by fraudulent devices; soak.

For ther is no thief withoute a lowke,
 That helpeh him to wasten, and to sucke
 of that he brybe kan or borwe may.
Chaucer, Cook's Tale, l. 52.

To suck in. (a) To draw into the mouth; imbibe; absorb. (b) To cheat; deceive; take in. (Slang.)—To suck the monkey. See monkey.—To suck up, to draw into the mouth; draw up by any sucking action.

II. intrans. 1. To draw fluid into the mouth;
 draw by producing a vacuum, as with a tube.

Where the bee sucks, there suck I.
Shak., Tempest, v. 1. 88.

2. To draw milk from a teat: said of the young of a mammal.—3. To draw air when the water is low or the valve imperfect: said of a pump.

This pump never sucks; these screws are never loose.
Emerson, Farming.

suck¹ (suk), n. [*< suck*¹, v. Cf. *suck*², n.] 1.
 Suction by the mouth or in any way; the act of sucking; a sucking force.

Powerful whirlpools, sucks and eddies.
Scribner's Mag., VIII. 611.

2. Nourishment drawn from the breast.

They moreover drawe unto themselves, together with theyr sucke, even the nature and disposition of theyr nurses.
Spenser, State of Ireland.

I have given suck, and know
 How tender 'tis to love the babe that milks me.
Shak., Macbeth, i. 7. 54.

3. A small draught. [Colloq.]

Well, no house? nor no tobacco?
Tap. Not a suck, sir;
 Nor the remainder of a single can.
Massinger, New Way to Pay Old Debts, i. 1.

4. Rum or liquor of some kind. Taft's Glos- sary.—5. Same as sucklet, 1.

suck² (suk), n. [< OF. (and F.) suc = Sp. suco frock worn over their other clothes by carters, etc.

She baddie on a suckenye,
 That not of hempe ne heerdeis was.
Roma. of the Rose, l. 1233.

sucker (suk'ér), n. [*< suck*¹ + -er.] 1. One who or that which sucks; a suckling.

The entry of doubts is as so many suckers or sponges to draw use of knowledge.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

Specifically—(a) A sucking pig: a commercial term.

For suckers the demand was not very brisk.

Standard, Sept. 3, 1882. (Encyc. Dict.)

(b) A new-born or very young whale, (c) In ornith, a bird which sucks or is supposed to do so: only in composition.
 See goutsucker, honey-sucker. (d) In ichth, one of numerous fishes which suck in some way or are supposed to do so, having a conformation of the protrusive lips which suggests a sucker, or a sucker-like organ on any part of the body by means of which the fish adheres to foreign objects.

(1) Any North American cyprinoid of the family Catostomi- dæ, as a carp-sucker, chub-sucker, hog-sucker, etc. There are about 60 species, of some 12 or 14 genera, almost confined to the fresh waters of North America, though one or two are Asiatic; they are little esteemed for food, the flesh being insipid and full of small bones. Leading generic forms besides Catostomus are Tetodon and Epiplatys, the buffalo-fishes; Carpionides, the carp-suckers, as C. cyprinus, the quillback or skimbuck; Cylocheilus, as C. elongatus, the black-horse, or gourd-seed sucker; Pantodon, the hard-headed suckers; Erimyzon, the chub-suckers, as E. succia, the sweet sucker; Moxostoma, the spotted suckers; Moxo- stoma, some of whose many species are called mullet, chub-mullet, jump-rocks, red-horse, etc.; and Quassidius, or hardheaded suckers. (See the distinctive names, with various cuts.) The typical genus Catostomus is an extensive one, including some of the commonest species, as C. com- mersoni, the white or brook sucker, 18 inches long, widely distributed from Labrador to Montana and southward to Florida; its section Hypentelium contains H. nigricans, the hog-sucker, hog-molly, or stone-lugger, etc. (2) Any fish of the genus Lepidogaster. The Cornish sucker is L.
gouani; the Connemara sucker, L. candollei; the bimaculated or network sucker, L. binaculatus. See cut under Lepidogaster. (Eng.) (3) A snail fish or sea-snail; one of several different members of the family Liparididae, as the unctuous sucker, Liparis vulgaris. See cuts under snail- fish. (4) The lump-sucker or lump-fish. See cut under Cyclopterus. (5) The sucking-fish or remora. See cut under Echeneis. (6) A cyclostomous fish, as the glutinous hag, Murice glutinosa. See cut under hag, 3. (7) A Californian food-fish, the scienoid Menticirrhus undulatus.

2. A suctorial part or organ; a formation of parts by means of which an animal sucks, imbibes, or adheres by atmospheric pressure, as if sucking; a sucking-tube or sucking-disk. (a)

The fin of a fish formed into a suctorial disk, as that of the remora. See cuts under Echeneis and Rhombocirrus. (b)
 The mouth of a ray or cyclostomous fish. (c) The hamellate or siphon-like mouth-parts of an insect or siphonstomous crustacean; a sucking-tube, especially of a flea.
 See cut under chrysalis. (d) One of the cup-shaped sucking-disks or cupules on the lower surface of the expanded tarsi, found in certain aquatic beetles. They are either affixed directly to the joint, or the smaller ones are elevated on stems, and resemble wine-glasses in shape. (e)

An adhesive pad of an insect's foot, as a fly's, by means of which it walks on walls and ceilings; a pulvillus. See cut under house-fly. (f) A sucking-disk or acetabulum of the arms of a cephalopod, as an octopus; one of the ac-etabuliferous arms of such an animal. See cut under cuttle- fish. (g) An adhesive or suctorial facet on the head or tail of various parasitic worms, as tapeworms or leeches; a bothrium. See cuts under Bucephalus, leech, and cestoid.
 (h) The disk-like suctorial mouth of a leech. (i) One of the ambulacral pedicels or tube-feet of echinodermis, as starfishes; a sucker-foot or sucker-tube.

3. The piston of a suction-pump.

Pretty store of oil must be poured into the cylinder,
 . . . that the sucker may slip up and down in it the more smoothly and freely.
Boyle, Works, I. 6.

4. A pipe or tube through which anything is drawn.—5. In bot.: (a) A shoot rising from a subterranean creeping stem. Plants which emit suckers freely, as the raspberry and rose, are readily propagated by division. (b) A sprout from the root near or at a distance from the trunk, as in the pear and white poplar, or an adventitious shoot from the body or a branch of a tree.

Here, therefore, is our safest course, to make a retrenchment of all those excrescences of affections which like the wild and irregular sucker, draw away nourishment from the trunk.
J. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 103.

(c) Same as haustorium. Compare propagulum
 (a).—6. A small piece of leather to the center of which a string is attached, used by children as a toy. When rendered flexible by wetting and pressed firmly down on a smooth object, as a stone, the adhesion of the two surfaces, due to atmospheric pressure, is so firm that a stone of considerable weight may be lifted by the string.

7. A parasite; a sponger; in recent use, also, a stupid person; a dolt. [Colloq.]

This sucker thinks nane wise
 But him that can to immense riches rise.
Alan Ramsay, The General Mistake.

A person readily deceived . . . the . . . Suckers . . .
 who, despite . . . oft-repeated warnings, . . . swallowed the hook so clumsily baited with "Kohanian Oats."
New York Semi-weekly Tribune, Jan. 11, 1887.

8. A cant name for an inhabitant of Illinois.
 [U. S.]—9. Same as sucklet, 1. [Scotch.]

sucker (suk'ér), v. [< sucker, n.] I. trans. 1. To strip off suckers or shoots from; deprive of suckers; specifically, to remove superfluous shoots from the root and at the axils of the leaves of (tobacco).

How the Indians ordered their tobacco I am not certain, . . . but I am informed they used to let it run to seed, only suckering the leaves to keep the sprouts from growing upon and starving them; and when it was ripe they pulled off the leaves, cured them in the sun, and laid them up for use. Beverly, Virginia, 11. 20.

2. To provide with suckers; as, the suckered arms of a cuttlefish. H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 5.

II. intrans. To send out suckers or shoots. Its most marked characteristics, however, are its tendencies to suck immoderately.

Scribner's Mag., March, 1880, p. 762.
suckerel (suk'ér-el), n. [< suck + -el, on model of pickerel.] A catostomid fish of the Mississippi valley, Cyprinus elongatus; the Missouri or gourd-seed sucker, or black-horse, a singular catostomid of large size (1½ to 2½ feet long), and of very dark or blackish coloration. See ent under Cyprinus.

sucker-fish (suk'ér-fish), n. The sucking-fish or remora. Jour. Anthropol. Inst., XIX. 325.

sucker-foot (suk'ér-füt), n. 1. One of the suctorial tube-feet, or sucker-tubes, of an echinoderm; an ambulacral pedicel capable of acting as a sucker.—2. In entom., a proleg.

sucker-mouthed (suk'ér-moutht), a. Having a mouth like that of the catostomid fishes called suckers; as, the sucker-mouthed buffalo, a fish, Ictiobus bubalus.

sucker-rod (suk'ér-rod), n. A rod which connects the brake and the bucket of a pump. E. H. Knight.

sucker-tube (suk'ér-tüb), n. One of the sucker-feet of an echinoderm.

sucket (suk'et), n. [Partly an accom. form of succade, partly < suck + -et. Cf. equiv. suck¹, 5, sucker, 9.] 1. A dried sweetmeat or sugar-phum; hence, a delicacy of any kind.

Windam, all rageing, brake yppe Pinteados Caben, broke open his chestes, spoyled suchie promysion of coultle stilled waters and suckettes as he had provided for his health, and lefte hym nothyng.

R. Eden, First Books on America (ed. Arber, p. 377).
But, monsieur,
Here are suckets, and sweet dishes.

Fletcher, Sea Voyage, v. 2.
2. A sucking rabbit. Hallucell. [Obsolete or provincial in both uses.]

suckfish (suk'fish), n. 1. The sucking-fish or remora.—2. A crustacean parasite of the sperm-whale; so called by whalers. Lobtailing is said to be done by the whale to rid itself of these troublesome creatures. C. M. Scammon.

suckin (suk'in), n. See sucken.

suck-in (suk'in), n. [< suck in: see suck¹.] A take-in; a fraud. [Slang.]

sucking (suk'ing), p. a. [< ME. souking; ppr. of suck¹, v.] 1. Drawing or deriving nourishment from the mother's breast; not yet weaned; very young.

There were three sucking pigs serv'd up in a dish. Massinger, City Madam, ii. 1.

Hence.—2. Figuratively, very young and inexperienced; undergoing training; in the early stage of a career; in leading-strings: "vealy."

My enemies are but sucking critics, who would fain be nibbling ere their teeth are come.

Dryden, All for Love, Pref.
The very curates . . . she . . . looked upon as sucking saints. Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, xiv.

3†. Draining; exhausting.

Accidia ys a sucking sore. Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnival), p. 117.

Sucking center, a nervous center believed to exist in the medulla, with afferent fibers from the fifth and glossopharyngeal nerves—the efferent fibers being in the facial, hypoglossal, third division of the fifth, and branches of the cervical plexus, which supply the depressors of the lower jaw.—Sucking dove, a sucker or dupe; a simpleton; a cony; a gull.

sucking-bottle (suk'ing-bot'l), n. A nursing-bottle.

sucking-disk (suk'ing-disk), n. A sucker; a discoidal sucking-organ, as an acetabulum; applied to any flat or concave expansive surface which functions as a sucker.

sucking-fish (suk'ing-fish), n. 1. A fish of the family Echeneididae; a remora.—2. The lamprey. [Local, Eng.]

sucking-pump (suk'ing-pump), n. Same as suction-pump.

sucking-stomach (suk'ing-stum'ak), n. The haustellate or suctorial stomach of various insects and some crustaceans, which sucks up the juices of plants on which they feed or of the host on which they are parasites.

suckiny, n. Same as suckeny.

suckle (suk'l), v.; pret. and ppr. sucked, ppr. suckling. [Freq. of suck¹. Cf. suckling.] I. trans. To give suck to; nurse at the breast.

She was a wight, if ever such wight were, . . . To suckle fools and chronicle small beer. Shak., Othello, ii. 1. 161.

II. intrans. To suck; nurse.

suckle† (suk'l), n. [< suckle, v.] A teat.

Two paps, which are not only suckles, but stilts to creep a shoare upon. Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 26.

suckler (suk'lér), n. [< suckle + -er.] An animal which suckles its young; any mammal; also, a young one not yet weaned; a suckling.

Sucklers, or even weaned calves. The Field, Jan. 16, 1886. (Encyc. Diet.)

sucklers (suk'lérz), n. [Pl. of suckler.] The red clover, Trifolium pratense; also, the white clover, T. repens; so called because the flowers are sucked for honey. Britten and Holland, [Prov. Eng.]

suckling (suk'ling), n. and a. [< ME. sokling, sokeling, sokelynge (= MD. suggelinck, sooghe-linck, D. zuigeling = MHG. zūgelin, G. süugling), a suckling, < soken, soaken, suck + -ling. Cf. suckle.] I. n. 1. A suckler; a young animal not yet weaned.

Babes and sucklings. Ps. viii. 2.

The tenderest Kid
And fattest of my Flock, a Suckling yet,
That ne'er had Nourishment but from the Teat.

Congreve, tr. of Eleventh Satire of Juvenal.
2. (a) The white clover, Trifolium repens; (b) the red clover, T. pratense; (c) the honeysuckle, Lonicera Periclymenum; so called because their flower-tubes are sucked for honey. Britten and Holland, [Prov. Eng.]—Lamb's suckling, the white clover, and the bird's-foot trefoil, Lobus corniculatus.—Yellow suckling, an agricultural name for the small yellow clover, Trifolium minus.

II. a. Sucking, as a young mammal; not yet weaned; hence, figuratively, young and inexperienced.

O breast whereat some suckling sorrow clings. Shakespeare, Love's Labour's Lost, v. 1. 108.

suckstone (suk'stôn), n. [< suck¹, v., + obj. stone.] The suckfish, Echeneis remora.

A little fishie called a suckstone, that stafeith a ship under sail, remora. Withals, Diet., 1608.

sucré†, n. and v. A Middle English form of sugar.

sucré (suk're), n. A silver coin of Ecuador, of the weight of 25 grams and the fineness of .900. Rep. of Sec. of Treasury, 1886, pp. 230, 412, 413.

sucrose (suk'krôs), n. [< F. sucre (see sugar) + -ose.] A general name for the sugars identical in composition and in general properties with cane-sugar, having the formula (C₁₂H₂₂O₁₁)_n; same as saccharose.

suction (suk'shon), n. [< OF. suction, F. succion = Sp. succión, < L. as if suctio(n)-*, < sugere, pp. suctus, suck; see suck.] The process or condition of sucking; the removal of air or gas from any interior space producing a diminution of pressure which induces an influx of gas or liquid to restore the equilibrium. If the process is maintained, a continuous current is produced. See suction-pump and pump. Also used attributively.—Suction curette of Teale, an instrument employed for the removal of a soft cataract from the eye.

suction-anemometer (suk'shon-an-e-mom'e-ter), n. An anemometer in which a diminution of pressure caused by the wind is used as a measure of its velocity. Two different forms have been proposed, corresponding to two distinct ways in which a moving fluid produces a diminution of pressure. This, the so-called suction, is produced in the one by the wind blowing through a horizontal tube having a contracted section, and in the other by the wind blowing across the mouth of a vertical tube.

suction-box (suk'shon-boks), n. In paper-making, a chamber in which there is a partial vacuum, placed below the web of pulp to assist in removing the water from it.

suction-chamber (suk'shon-châm'bér), n. The barrel or chamber of a pump into which the liquid is delivered from the suction-pipe.

suction-fan (suk'shon-fan), n. In milling, a fan for withdrawing by suction chaff and refuse from grain, or steam and hot air from meal as it comes from the burs. E. H. Knight.

suction-pipe (suk'shon-pîp), n. 1. The pipe leading from the bottom of a pump-barrel or cylinder to the well, cistern, or reservoir from which the water or other liquid is to be drawn up. See pump.—2. An air-tight pipe running from beneath a water-wheel to the level of the tail-race. It is said to render the whole fall available. E. H. Knight.

suction-plate (suk'shon-plât), n. A form of dental plate for supporting an upper set of artificial teeth, held in position by atmospheric pressure induced by a vacuum between the plate and the roof of the mouth.

suction-primer (suk'shon-pri-mér), n. A small force-pump fitted to a steam-pump, and used to fill the pump and drive out the air before admitting steam to the main pump.

suction-pump (suk'shon-pump), n. A pump having a barrel placed above the level of the water to be drawn, a suction-pipe extending from the barrel down into the water to be raised, an inlet-valve opening inward or toward the piston, and an outlet-valve in the piston. When the piston is raised, the air in the barrel below the piston expands, its tension is correspondingly diminished, and the pressure of the external air upon the surface of the liquid outside forces it up into the suction-tube. See pump.

suction-valve (suk'shon-valv), n. 1. In a suction-pump, the valve in the bottom of the barrel, below the piston.—2. In a steam-engine, a valve through which the rise of the plunger causes the water from the hot-well to flow into the feed-pump.

Suctorio (suk-tô'ri-ô), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of suctorius; see suctorius.] Suctorial animals; applied to various zoölogical groups in which the mouth is suctorial, haustellate, siphonostomous, or otherwise fitted for sucking. Specifically—(a) In ichth., the cyclostomous fishes, or myxozonts; the lampreys and hags, having the mouth formed into a sucker; in Cuvier's system, the second family of Chondropterygii branchii fissis, later called Cyclostomata, or Cyclostomi, and Myxozontes, and now known as the class Maripobranchii. Also Suctorii. See ent under lamprey. (b) In Fernex: (1) The suctorial or disciphorous annelids; the leeches; now called Hirudinea. See ent under leech. (2) A branch of the phylum Platyhelmintha, composed of the three classes Trematodea, Cestodea, and Hirudinea; an artificial group contrasted with a branch Ciliata. E. R. Lankester. (c) In entom., the suctorial apterous insects; so called by De Geer; in Latreille's system, the fourth order of insects, also called by him Siphonaptera, and now known as Aphaniptera; the fleas. (d) In Crustacea, the Rhizocephala or Centropoda. (e) In Protozoa, the suctorial, acinetiform, or tentaculiferous infusorians; in the classification of Charadæ and Leachmann (1858-60), the third order of Infusoria, consisting of a family Actinetina, with genera called by Kent Tentaculifera suctoria. See Tentaculifera.

suctorial (suk-tô'ri-âl), a. [< suctori-ous + -al.] 1. Adapted for sucking; functioning as a sucker or sucking-organ of any kind; sucking; haustellate; as, the suctorial mouth of a lamprey; the suctorial tongue (antlia) of a butterfly or moth; the suctorial proboscis of a flea; the suctorial disk of a sucking-fish, an octopod, a leech; the suctorial facets of a trematoid worm; the suctorial tentacles of an infusorian.—2. Capable of sucking; fitted for imbibing fluid or for adhering by means of suckers; provided with a sucking-organ, whether for imbibing or for adhering; of or pertaining to the Suctorio, in any sense; as, a suctorial bird, fish, worm, insect, crustacean, or animalcule.—Suctorial fishes, the cyclostomous fishes, or lampreys and hags; same as Suctorio (a). The lancelets have been called fringed-mouthed suctorial fishes.

suctorian (suk-tô'ri-an), n. [< suctori-ous + -an.] A suctorial animal; a member of the Suctorio, in any sense; especially, a cyclostomous fish.

suctorious (suk-tô'ri-us), a. [< NL. suctorius, < L. suctorius, < sugere, pp. suctus, suck; see suck¹.] Same as suctorial.—Suctorious mandibles, in entom., mandibles which are tubular, having an orifice through which liquid food passes to the mouth, as in the larvae of certain aquatic beetles and in the young ant-lion.

sud (sud), n. [A var. of sud¹, or from the same ult. source; see sud¹, sud². Cf. suds.] 1. The drift-sand left in meadows by the overflowing of rivers. [Prov. Eng.]—2. A young scallop of the first year, from July to November.

The Brahmin still dodges the shadow of the Soodra, and the Soodra spits upon the footprint of the Pariah.

J. W. Palmer, The New and the Old, p. 289.

suds (sudz), n. pl. [Prop. pl. of sud, var. of sod, lit. 'a bubbling or boiling'; see sud, sod, scethe.]

1. Water impregnated with soap, forming a frothy mass; a lixivium of soap and water.

Alas! my miserable master, what suds art thou wash'd into!

Marston, The Fawne, iv. 1.

Why, thy best shirt is in t' suds, and no time for t' starch and iron it.

Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, xvii.

2. The foam or spray churned up by a wounded whale; white water. [Slang.]

An officer of a boat never follows the wake of a right whale, for the moment the boat strikes the suds it is maintained that the whale is immediately made acquainted with the fact through some unknown agency.

Fisheries of U. S., V. ii. 261.

In the suds, in turmoil or difficulty; in distress. [Colloq.]

Hist, hist, I will be rul'd;

Tennyson, The Mermanid.

5. To seek justice or right from by legal process; institute process in law against; prosecute in a civil action for the recovery of a real or supposed right; as, to sue one for debt; to sue one for damages in trespass. [Used sometimes of the object of the action instead of the defendant.]

The executors of bishops are sued if their mansion-house be suffered to go to decay. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, vii. 24.

It is written, our men's goods and estates in Spain are confiscated, and our men sued, some to be imprisoned, others to be enjoined, on pain of death, to depart.

Court and Times of Charles I., I. 69.

To sue livery, to sue out livery, to take proceedings, on arriving at age, to recover lands which the king had held as guardian in chivalry during the plaintiff's minority; hence, metaphorically, to declare one's self of age.

I am denied to sue my livery here.

Shak., Rich. II., II. 3. 129.

Our little Cupid hath sued livery,
And is no more in his minority.

Donne, Eclogue (1613).

It concern'd them first to sue out their liveries from the unjust wardship of his encroaching Prerogative.

Milton, Ikonoklastes, xi.

To sue out, to petition for and take out; apply for and obtain: as, to sue out a writ in chancery; to sue out a pardon for a criminal.

Thou art my husband, no divorce in heaven
Has been sued out between us.

Ford, Perkin Warbeck, v. 3.

And now he would go to London at once, and sue out his pardon.

R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, xxxviii.

II. intrans. 1†. To follow; come after, either as a consequence or in pursuit.

With Ercles and other mo of his amie men,
He sues furth on the sole to Chethes the kyng.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 821.

Wethit wel that we . . . have crauntyd . . . to the citizens of the forsayd cite the franchises that ben suyng to haue to hem and to her eyers and successors for euer.

Charter of London (Rich. II.), in Arnold's Chron., p. 28.

The kyngz dide do make this dragon in all the haste he

To her to whom the heavens do serve and sue?

Spenser, F. Q., III. v. 47.

Wall. Has she no suitors? . . .

All. Such as sue and send.

And send and sue again, but to no purpose.

Massinger, New Way to Pay Old Debts, i. 1.

4. To prosecute; make legal claim; seek for something in law: as, to sue for damages.

Their fast, on the 17 of the fourth Moneth, . . . and from thence to the ninth day of the month following, are holden vnluckie dayes, in which schoole masters may not beat their schollers, nor any man will sue at the law.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 211.

5†. To issue; flow.

Being rough-cast with odious sores to cover
The deadly juice that from his brain doth sue.

J. Beaumont, Psyche, ii. 167.

To sue, labor, and travel, in Eng. marine insurance, to make due exertions and use necessary and proper means: used with reference to the preservation of insured property from loss or to its recovery. What is called the suing and laboring clause in a policy usually provides that "in any case of loss or misfortune, it shall be lawful to the assured . . . to sue, labour, and travel for, in, and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of" what is insured.

These two words (sue and labor), the meaning of which is different, and not merely a redundant parallelism, take in the acts of the owner or assured, whether in asserting and following the rights of interests in danger, or working and expending money for the benefit of those interests. . . . In this clause two things are noticeable: that suing (which in this place is understood 'doing work,' and not simply 'suing at law'), labouring, and travelling are made lawful to certain persons acting in lieu of the insured, and that to such expenses of suing, etc., the underwriters agree to contribute their share.

Hopkins, Law of Gen. Av., pp. 386, 390.

sue^{2†}. An old spelling of sue¹, sue³, 2.

suède (swäd), a. and n. [F. 'Swede.'] Of un-see sebaceous, soap.] The fatty tissue about the loins and kidneys of certain animals, as the ox, the sheep, the goat, and the hart, harder and less fusible than that from other parts of the same animals. That of the ox and sheep is chiefly used, and when melted out of its connective tissue forms tallow. Mutton suet is used as an ingredient in cerates, plasters, and ointments; beef suet, and also mutton suet, are used in cookery. The corresponding flaky fat of hogs furnishes leaf-lard.

suety (sü'et-i), a. [< suet + -y¹.] Consisting of suet or resembling it: as, a suety substance.

Every miracle is the suffrage of Heaven to the truth of a doctrine. South.

4. Eccles., an intercessory prayer or petition.

The suffrages of all the saints. Longfellow.

In liturgies: (a) Short petitions, especially those in the litany, the lesser litany or process at morning and evening prayer, etc.

And then shall be said the litany: save only that after this place: That . . . etc., the proper suffrage shall be, etc. Book of Common Prayer, Consecr. of Bishops.

(b) The prayers of the people in response to and as distinguished from the versicles or prayers said in litanies by the clergyman.

5†. Aid; assistance; relief.

Charms for every disease, and sovereign suffrages for every sore. W. Patten (Arber's Eng. Garner, III. 71).

Female suffrage, the political right of women to vote. It is granted in the Constitutions of the States of Wyoming and Utah; and several other States of the Union allow women to vote on certain local matters, as is also the case in Great Britain. — Household suffrage. See household. — Manhood suffrage, a popular phrase denoting suffrage granted to all male citizens who are of age, and are not physically or morally incapacitated for its exercise, universal suffrage. — Universal suffrage, a loose phrase, commonly meaning suffrage of adult males; restricted only by non-citizenship, minority, criminal character, or bankruptcy; manhood suffrage.

suffrage (suf-rāj), v. t. i. pret. and pp. suffraged, pp. suffraging. [< OF. suffragar, < L. suffragari, ML. also suffragare, vote for, support with one's vote, support, favor, assist, < suffragium, a vote: see suffrage, n. Cf. suffragant, suffragan.] To vote for; elect. Milton, Reformation in Eng., ii. [Rare.]

suffragines, n. Plural of suffrago.

suffraginoust† (su-fraj'i-nus), a. [< L. suffraginosus, diseased in the hock, < suffraga (-in-), hock: see suffrago.] Of or pertaining to the suffrago, especially of the horse.

The hough or suffraginous flexure behind.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 1.

suffragist (suf-rāj-ist), n. [< suffrage + -ist.] 1. One who possesses or exercises the right of suffrage; a voter. — 2. One holding certain opinions concerning the right of suffrage, as about its extension: as, a woman-suffragist.

One ardent suffragist, already referred to, reasoning by analogy from lower to higher, proves the worthlessness of man by the fact that the female spider devours her male consort.

Atlantic Monthly, LXV. 312.

suffrago (su-frā'gō), n.; pl. suffragines (-frāj'i-nēz). [L.: see suffrage.] 1. The hock, or so-called knee, of a horse's hind leg, whose convexity is backward, and which corresponds to the human heel; the tibiotarsal articulation. See cuts under hock and Perissodactyla. — 2. In ornith., the heel proper, sometimes called the knee; the mediotarsal articulation, whose convexity is backward, at the top of the shank, where the feathers of most birds stop.

suffrutescent (suf-rō'tes-ent), a. [< sub- + frutescent.] In bot., only slightly or obscurely woody; a little woody at the base.

suffrutex (suf-rō'teks), n. [NL., < L. sub, under, + frutex, a shrub, a bush: see fruter, v.] 1. In bot., an undershrub, or very small shrub; a low plant with decidedly woody stems, as the trailing arbutus, American wintergreen, etc. — 2. A plant with a permanent woody base, but with a herbaceous annual growth above, as the garden-sage, thyme, etc. [Rare, Eng.] suffruticose (suf-rō'ti-kōs), a. [< suffrutex (-is) + -ose; or < sub- + fruticose.] In bot., having the character of a suffrutex: small with woody stems, or having the stems woody at the base and herbaceous above; somewhat shrubby; noting a plant or a stem.

suffruticous (su-frō'ti-kus), a. Same as suffruticose.

suffruticulose (suf-rō'tik'ū-lōs), a. [< sub- + fruticulose.] In bot., slightly fruticulose, as some lichens.

suffulted (su-ful'ted), a. In entom., gradually changing to another color. — Suffulted pupil, the central spot of an ocellus when it is formed by two colors shading off into each other.

suffumigate (su-fū'mi-gāt), v. t. pret. and pp. suffumigated, pp. suffumigating. [< L. suffumigatus, pp. of suffumigare, suffumigare (> It. suffumigare, suffumicare), smoke from below, < sub, under, + fumigare, smoke: see fumigate.] To apply fumes or smoke to, as to the body in medical treatment.

suffumigation (su-fū-mi-gā'shon), n. [Also suffumigatum; < ME. suffumigacioun, < OF. (and F.) suffumigation = Sp. suffumigación = Pg. suffumigação = It. suffumigiatura, < L. suffumigatio (-is), suffumigatus (-us), a smoking from below: see suffumigate.] 1. The act of fumigating, literally from below; fumigation.

Take your note in the hottest time of summer in cold places, but in the winter let there be a bright fire, and take it in hotte places, your parlors or chambers being first purged and ayred with suffumigations.

Taber's Book (E. L. T. S.), p. 257.

2. The act of burning perfumes: one of the ceremonies in incantation.

Supplicator.

That usen exorcismations

And eke suffumigations.

Chaucer, House of Fame, l. 1294.

A simple suffumigation, . . . accompanied by availing ourselves of the suitable planetary hour.

Scott, Antiquary, xiii.

3. A fume; especially, a preparation used in fumigating.

As the suffumigations of the oppressed stomach surge up and cause the headache.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, l. 294.

Another piebald keave

Of the same brotherhood (he loved them ever)

Was actively preparing 'neath his nose

Such a suffumigation as, once fired,

Had stunk the patient dead ere he could groan.

Bronning, Paracelsus.

suffumige† (su-fū'mij), n. [< ML. suffumigium, < L. suffumigare, smoke from below: see suffumigate.] A medicinal fume.

suffuse (su-fūz'), v. t. i. pret. and pp. suffused, pp. suffusing. [< L. suffusus, pp. of suffundere, pour below or underneath, or upon, overspread, < sub, under, + fundere, pour out, spread out: see fuse, v.] To overspread, as with a fluid or tincture; fill or cover, as with something fluid: as, eyes suffused with tears.

When purple light shall next suffuse the skies. Pope.

Hers was a face suffused with the fine essence of beauty.

T. Widdrop, Cecil Dreeme, xv.

Alpine meadows soft suffused

With rain.

M. Arnold, Stanzas from the Grande Chartreuse.

suffusion (su-fū'zhon), n. [= F. suffusion = Sp. sufusión = Pg. sufusão = It. suffusione, < L. suffusio(-is), a pouring out or over, a spreading: see suffuse.] 1. The act or operation of suffusing or overspreading, as with a fluid or a color; also, the state of being suffused or overspread.

To those that have the jaundice or like suffusion of eyes, objects appear of that color. Ray.

2. That which is suffused or spread over, as an extravasation of blood.

So thick a drop serene hath quenched their orbs,

Or dim suffusion veiled. Milton, P. L., iii. 26.

3. In entom., a peculiar variegation, observed especially in Lepidoptera, in which the colors appear to be blended or run together. It is most common in northern or alpine forms of species which are found with normal colors in warmer regions.

suffusive (su-fū'siv), a. [< suffusus + -ive.] Pertaining to suffusion; overspreading. George Eliot, Middlemarch, xvi.

sufi, sufī (sū'fi, sō'fi), n. [Also soofie, sophy, etc.: = F. sufi, soufi; = Hind. sufi, < Ar. sufi, a Moslem mystic; either lit. 'wise,' < Gr. σοφός, wise (see sophist); or, according to some, < suf, wool, the sufis (dervishes, fakirs) being obliged to wear garments of wool, and not of silk.] A Mohammedan mystic who believes (1) that God alone exists, and that all visible and invisible beings are mere emanations from him; (2) that, as God is the real author of all acts of mankind, man is not a free agent, and there can be no real difference between good and evil; (3) that, as the soul existed before the body, and is confined within the latter as in a cage, death should be the chief object of desire, for only then does the soul return to the bosom of the divinity; and (4) that religions are matters of indifference, though some are more advantageous than others (as, for instance, Mohammedanism), and that sufism is the only true philosophy.

If Pharaoh's Title had befall'n to thee [Solomon],

If the Moses Myter bowed at thy knee,

Wert thou a Sophy; yet with Vertues luster

Thou oughtst (at least) thy Greatness to illust'r.

Sylvest'r, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii. The Magnificence.

The principal occupation of the Sufi whilst in the body is meditation on the . . . unity of God, the remembrance of God's names, . . . and the progressive advancement in the . . . journey of life, so as to attain unification with God.

Hughes, Dict. of Islam, p. 600.

sufic (sū'fik), a. [< sufi + -ic.] Of or pertaining to sufism.

There are frequent Sufic allegories, just as in the Makhzan. Encyc. Brit., XVII. 522.

sufism, sofism (sō'fizm, sō'fizm), n. [Also sufism; < sufi + -ism.] The mystical system of the sufis.

The system of philosophy professed by Persian poets and dervishes, and in accordance with which the poems of Hafiz are allegorically interpreted, is called Sufism. Encyc. Brit., XI. 368.

sufistic (sō-fis'tik), a. [Also sufistic; < sufi + -ist + -ic.] Same as sufic.

The point of view indicated by the Sufistic system of philosophy. Encyc. Brit., XI. 368.

sug (sug), n. [Origin obscure.] An unidentified parasite of the trout, probably an epizootic crustacean. Also called trout-louse.

Many of them (trout) have sticking on them Sugs, or Trout-lice, which is a kind of Worm, in shape like a clove, or Pin with a big head, and sticks close to him and sucks his moisture. J. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 91.

sug-. See sub-.

Sugantia (sū-gan'shi-ā), n. pl. A variant of Sugantia.

sugar (shūg'ār), n. [Early mod. E. also suger; < ME. suger, sugre, sugre, < OF. sucre, F. sucre = Pr. sucre = Sp. azúcar = Pg. assucar (with Ar. article al) = It. zucchero = D. sukker = MLG. sucker = OHG. zucra, MHG. zucker, zucker, G. zucker = Icel. sykr = Sw. söcker = Dan. sukker = OBulg. sakharū = Serv. čukara, zakarā, čukar = Bohem. ukr = Little Russ. ukor, ukur = Russ. sakharū = Pol. cukier = Hung. zucker (Slavic, etc., partly after G.). < ML. succarum, succarium, sucarium, also succarium, zuccara, zucara, also suctura, etc., altered forms, in part appar. simulating L. succus, sucus, juice (see *suck*2), of saccharum, L. saccharum, < Gr. σάκχαρ, σάκχαρον, < Ar. sakkar, sakkar, sukkar, with the article as-sakkar, < Pers. shakar = Hind. shakkar, < Prakrit sakkara, sugar, < Skt. śarkara, candied sugar, orig. grit, gravel; cf. Skt. karkara, hard, L. calculus, a pebble (see calculus).]

1. The general name of certain chemical compounds belonging to the group of carbohydrates. They are soluble in water, have a more or less sweet taste, and are directly or indirectly fermentable. According to their chemical nature they are divided into two classes, the saccharoses and glucoses. See saccharose and glucose.
2. A sweet crystalline substance, prepared chiefly from the expressed juice of the sugar-cane, Saccharum officinarum, and of the sugar-beet, but obtained also from a great variety of other plants, as maple, maize, sorghum, birch, and pampin. The process of manufacturing cane-sugar generally begins with extracting the juice of the canes, either by passing them between the rollers of a rolling-mill (see sugar-mill), or by the use of rasps or "debrators" reducing the canes to pulp and expressing the juice by subjecting the pulp to the action of powerful presses. Maceration of the canes in steam or water, as a preparation for extraction of the juice, is also practised to some extent. Another method, now coming extensively into use, is that of diffusion, in which the canes or beets are cut in small pieces, and the sugar is extracted by repeated washings with hot water. (Compare diffusion apparatus (under diffusion), and osmose.) The extraction of the juice by the crushing and expressing action of rollers in sugar-mills is, however, still more extensively practised than any other method. The juice is received in a shallow trough placed beneath the rollers, and defecated by adding to it while heated below the boiling-point either milk of lime, lime-water, bisulphite of lime, lime followed by sulphur dioxide, sulphur dioxide followed by lime, alkaline earths, sulphur compounds, or chlorine compounds, milk of lime being more generally used than any of the other substances named. (Compare defecator.) The saccharine liquor is concentrated by boiling, which expels the water; lime-water is added to neutralize the acid that is usually present; the grosser impurities rise to the surface, and are separated in the form of scum. When duly concentrated the syrup is run off into shallow wooden coolers, where it concretes; it is then put into hogsheads with holes in the bottom, through which the molasses drains off into cisterns below, leaving the sugar in the state known in commerce by the name of raw sugar, or muscovado. Sometimes the molasses is immediately separated from the sugar by centrifugal force. The raw sugar is further purified by solution in water and filtration, first through cotton bags, then through layers of animal charcoal, boiling down under diminished pressure, and crystallization. Thus clarified, it takes the names of lump-sugar, loaf-sugar, refined sugar, etc., according to the different degrees of purification and the form in which it is placed on the market. The manufacture of sugar from beet-root is carried on to a very considerable extent in France, Germany, Austria, Belgium, the Netherlands, Russia, etc. The sugar is mostly extracted from the roots by diffusion, and the subsequent defecation and concentration are carried out in a manner entirely analogous to that described for these operations in the manufacture of cane-sugar. In the United States and in Canada great quantities of sugar are obtained from the sap of the sugar-maple, Acer saccharinum. (See sap under Acer.) The Gulf States and the West Indies are the principal sources whence the supplies of cane-sugar are derived; the sugar used on the continent of Europe is chiefly obtained from the beet. Sugar was only vaguely known to the Greeks and Romans; it seems to have been introduced into Europe during the time of the crusades. The cane was grown about the middle of the twelfth century in Cyprus, whence, some time later, it was transplanted into Madeira, and about the beginning of the sixteenth century it was thence carried to the New World. For the chemical properties of pure cane-sugar, see saccharose, 3.

This Manna is elect Bred of Angeles; and it is a white thing, that is full sweete and righte delicious, and more sweete than Honey or Sugre. Mandeville, Travels, p. 152.

When shall we have any good sugar come over? The wars in Barbary make sugar at such an excessive rate, you pay sweetly now, I warrant, sir, do you not?

Dekker and Webster, Northward Ho, ii. 1.

3. Something that resembles sugar in any of its properties.—4. Figuratively, sweet, honeyed, or soothing words; flattery employed to disguise something distasteful.—Bastard, beet-root, black, centrifugal sugar. See the qualifying words.—Brown sugar, common dark muscovado sugar. Coffee-crushed sugar, a commercial name for crushed sugar in which the lumps are of convenient size for table use in sweetening coffee and tea.—Confectioners' sugar, a highly refined sugar pulverized to an impalpable powder, used by confectioners for various purposes.—Crushed sugar, a commercial name for loaf-sugar broken into irregular lumps.—Cut sugar, a commercial name for loaf-sugar cut into prismatic form, generally cubes.—Diabetic sugar. See diabetic.—Ergot-sugar, a sugar obtained from ergot. Its crystals are transparent rhombic prisms. It is soluble in both water and alcohol, and the solution is capable of undergoing alcoholic fermentation.—Gelatin sugar. Same as glyceoll.—Granulated sugar. (a) A sugar which, by stirring during the crystallization of the concentrated syrup, is formed into small disintegrated crystals or grains, instead of compacting into a crystalline cake or mass as in loaf-sugar. (b) The coarse grains or dust of refined sugar formed during the operations of crushing or cutting loaf-sugar, and separated from the lumps by screening.—Inverted sugar. Same as invert-sugar.—Liquid sugar, a name sometimes given to uncrystallizable glucose; this substance, however, is capable of solidifying into an amorphous mass.—Malado sugar, sugar conglomerated into a sticky mass, the crystalline form of the sugar being masked by the presence of a quantity of highly concentrated invert-sugar which cements the crystals together; distinguished from muscovado sugar, in which the sugar has a distinctly crystalline form—the small crystals, however, being more or less colored by invert-sugar and adhering impurities.—Maple sugar. See *maple*1.—Pulverized sugar, a commercial name for refined sugar ground to a fineness intermediate between that of granulated sugar and confectioners' sugar.—Rotatory power of sugar. See rotatory polarization, under rotatory.—Starch-sugar. Same as dextrose.—Sugar of acorns, quercite.—Sugar of Barbary, the finest sugar, which was formerly supposed to be brought from Barbary, before the trade of the West Indies was fully established. (Nares.)

Ah sweet, honey, Barbary sugar, sweet master.

Marston, What you Will, ii. 3.

Sugar of lead. See *lead*2.—Sugar of milk, lactose.

sugar (shūg'ār), v. [< ME. sugren, < OF. sucrer, sugar; from the noun.] I. trans. 1. To season, cover, sprinkle, mix, or impregnate with sugar.—2. Figuratively, to cover as with sugar; sweeten; disguise so as to render acceptable what is otherwise distasteful.

We are off to blame in this—

'Tis too much proved—that with devotion's visage

And pious action we do sugar o'er

The devil himself. Shak., Hamlet, iii. 1. 48.

II. intrans. 1. To sweeten something, as tea, with sugar. [Rare.]

He sugared, and creamed, and drank, and spoke not.

Miss Edgeworth, Helen, xxvi. (Daries.)

2. To make (maple) sugar. [U. S. and Canada.]—To sugar off, in maple-sugar manuf., to pour the syrup into molds to granulate, when sufficiently boiled down. The sugaring off is the last process, and is usually attended with some sort of frolic in the sugar-camp. [U. S. and Canada.]

sugar-apple (shūg'ār-ā'p'l), n. See Rollinia.

sugar-baker (shūg'ār-bā'kér), n. One who refines sugar.

You know her mother was a Welsh milliner, and her father a sugar-baker at Bristol.

Sheridan, School for Scandal, ii. 2.

sugar-bean (shūg'ār-bēn), n. A variety of Phaseolus lunatus (see bean), cultivated particularly in Jamaica. The species is probably a native of tropical America, but is widely diffused in cultivation.

sugar-beet (shūg'ār-bēt), n. See *beet*1.

sugarberry (shūg'ār-ber'i), n.; pl. sugarberries (-iz). Same as huckleberry, 2.

sugar-bird (shūg'ār-bērd), n. 1. Any bird of the family Certhiidae, as the Bahaman honey-creeper, Certhiola bahamensis: so called from its habit of sucking the sweets of flowers. See ent under Certhiidae.—2. A honey-eater or honey-sucker; one of various tenuous birds of the Old World which suck the sweets of flowers. See Nectariniidae, Meliphagidae.—3. A translation of the Indian name of the American evening grosbeak or hawfinch, Coccothraustes or Hesperiphona vespertina, which is especially fond of maple sugar. [Local, U. S.]

sugar-bush (shūg'ār-būsh), n. 1. Same as sugar-orchard.—2. See Protea.

sugar-camp (shūg'ār-kamp), n. A place in or near a maple forest or orchard where the sap from the trees is collected and manufactured into sugar. [U. S. and Canada.]

sugar-candiant (shūg'ār-kan'di-ān), n. Sugar-candy.

If nor a dram of treacle sovereign,
Or aqua-vite, or sugar-candian,
Nor kitchen cordials can it remedy,
Certes his time is come.

Bp. Hall, Satires, II. lv. 30.

sugar-candy (shūg'ār-kan'di), n. Sugar clarified and concentered or crystallized. Compare *candy*1.

sugar-cane (shūg'ār-kan), n. A saccharine grass, Saccharum officinarum, the original source of manufactured sugar, and still the source of most of the supply.

Sugar cane (Saccharum officinarum).
a, part of the inflorescence; b, a spikelet.

The sugar-cane is a stout perennial with the habit of Indian corn and sorghum, growing from 6 to 20 feet high; the leaves are broad and flat, 3 feet or more long; the joints of the stalk are about 3 inches long near the foot, becoming longer upwardly, at length producing a very long joint called the "arrow," which bears a large panicle. Sugar-cane is propagated almost wholly by cuttings, the power to perfect seed being nearly lost through cultivation. Seedlings, however, have recently been observed in Barbados. The first growth from the cuttings is called plant-cane. The succeeding years the root sends up ratoons, which form the crop for one, two, or sometimes more years, its value decreasing from exhaustion of the soil. The cane requires a rich moist soil, preferring the vicinity of the sea. The plant is not known in a wild state, but is supposed to have originated in southern Asia, perhaps in Cochin-China or Bengal. Its cultivation in those regions began very early, and now extends throughout the tropics, the stalk being chewed where not otherwise used. It is grown in the United States in several southern States, but only in Louisiana in sufficient amount for the export of sugar.—African sugar-cane, an African variety of the common sorghum, called imphoe.—Chinese sugar-cane. Same as sorghum, 1. Sugar-cane beetle, a scarabid beetle, Ligyrus rugiceps, which damages sugar-cane in Louisiana by boring into the canes in the early spring and gnawing off the buds. It also damages sorghum and corn in the southern United States.—Sugar-cane borer, the larva of a crambid moth, Chilo saccharalis, which bores sugar-cane in the southern United States, the West Indies, and elsewhere.

Sugar-cane Beetle (Ligyrus rugiceps), nearly twice natural size.

sugar-coated (shūg'ār-kō'ted), a. Coated with sugar; as, a sugar-coated pill; hence, made palatable, in any sense.

sugared (shūg'ār'd), p. a. Sweet; alluring; honeyed; formerly much used in poetry to express anything unusually attractive: as, sugared conceits.

This messenger connyng and gentile was,
Off hys mouth issued sugred swete langage.

Rom. of Parthenay (E. E. T. S.), i. 6029.

A sugared Kiss

In sport I suckt, while she asleep did lie.

Sir P. Sidney (Arber's Eng. Garner, i. 539).

sugar-grass (shūg'ār-grās), n. 1. The common sorghum, particularly its Chinese variety.—2. The grass Pennisetum Cumingii, var. fulva. [Australia.]

sugar-gum (shūg'ār-gum), n. An Australian gum-tree, Eucalyptus corymbosa, which grows 120 feet high, and affords a durable timber, used for railroad-ties, posts, etc. The foliage is sweetish, and, unlike that of most eucalypts, attracts cattle and sheep.

sugar-house (shūg'ār-hous), n. A manufacturing establishment in which saccharine juices are extracted from cane, etc., and treated to make raw sugar. In some such establishments the process of refining is carried further; but they are more properly called refineries.—Sugar-house molasses, a very dark and concentrated low-grade molasses containing much caramel, formerly largely produced at sugar-houses (whence the name), but now, under improved methods of manufacture, much reduced in quantity, and little used except in the manufacture of some proprietary medicines and in some chemical industries.

sugar-huckleberry (shūg'ār-huk'1-ber-i), n. See huckleberry.

sugariness (shùg'ür-i-nes), n. The state or quality of being sugary or sweet.

A . . . flavor, not wholly unpleasing, nor unwholesome, to palates cloyed with the sugariness of tamed and cultivated fruit. Lowell, Biglow Papers, 1st ser., Int.

sugaring (shùg'ür-ing), n. [Verbal n. of sugar, v.] 1. The act of sweetening with sugar.—2. The sugar used for sweetening.—3. The process of making sugar.

sugar-kettle (shùg'ür-ket'el), n. A kettle used for boiling down saccharine juice.

sugarless (shùg'ür-less), a. [< sugar + -less.] Free from sugar.

sugar-loaf (shùg'ür-lōf), n. and a. [< ME. sagor-loff, "superclof; < sugar + loaf.] 1. n. 1. A conical mass of refined sugar. Hence—2. A hat of a conical shape.

I pray you that ye will vouchsaf to send me another sugar loaf, for my old is do; and also that ye will do make a gyrdill for your dowgter, for she hath nede therof. Paston Letters, I, 236.

3. A high conical hill: a common local name.

II. a. Having the form of a sugar-loaf; having a high conical form: as, a sugar-loaf hat. —Sugar-loaf tool, in seal-engraving, a tool with an end of soft iron shaped like a sugar-loaf, used to smooth the surfaces of shields.

sugar-louse (shùg'ür-lous), n. 1. Same as sugar-mite.—2. A springtail, Lepisma saccharina. See cut under silverfish.

sugar-maple (shùg'ür-mā'pl), n. See maple and Acer (with cut).

sugar-meat (shùg'ür-mēt), n. Same as sweet-meat.

Then . . . came another "most sumptuous banquet of sugar-meats for the men-at-arms and the ladies," after which, it being now midnight, the Lord of Leicester bade the whole company good rest. Motley, Hist. Netherlands, II, 17.

sugar-mill (shùg'ür-mil), n. A machine for pressing out the juice of the sugar-cane. It consists usually of three parallel heavy rollers, placed horizontally one above and between the other two. The canes are made to pass between the rollers, by which means they are crushed, and the juice is expressed from them.

Sugar-mill at work.

sugar-millet (shùg'ür-mil'et), n. The common sorghum.

sugar-mite (shùg'ür-mit), n. A mite of the family Tyroglyphidae, Tyroglyphus or Glyciphagus sacchari, or some other species of the restricted genus Glyciphagus, infesting sugar. These mites abound in some samples of unrefined sugar, and are supposed to cause grocers' itch. Also sugar-louse.

sugar-mold (shùg'ür-mōld), n. A conical mold in which sugar-loaves are formed in the process of refining.

sugar-nippers (shùg'ür-nip'ēr), n. sing. and pl. 1. A tool for cutting loaf-sugar into small lumps. It is made like shears with a spring-back, but the blades are edged and are directly opposite each other. 2. Same as sugar-tongs.

sugar-orchard (shùg'ür-ör'ehārd), n. A collection or small plantation of sugar-maples. Also called sugar-bush. [American.] sugar-packer (shùg'ür-pak'ēr), n. A machine for packing sugar into barrels.

sugar-pan (shùg'ür-pan), n. An open or closed vessel for concentrating syrups of sugar. See also vacuum-pan.—Sugar-pan lifter, a form of crane especially designed for lifting sugar-pans from the furnaces.

sugar-pea (shùg'ür-pē), n. See pea 1.

sugar-pine (shùg'ür-pīn), n. See pine 1.

sugar-plate (shùg'ür-plāt), n. Sweetmeats. Pattenham.

sugar-planter (shùg'ür-plan'tēr), n. One who owns or manages land devoted to the cultivation of the sugar-cane.

sugar-plum (shùg'ür-plum), n. A sweetmeat made of boiled sugar and various flavoring and coloring ingredients into a round shape, or into the shape of flattened balls or disks; a bon-bon; hence, something particularly pleasing, as a bit of flattery.

If the child must have grapes or sugar-plums when he has a mind to them. Locke, Education, § 36.

"His Grace is very condescending," said Mrs. Glass, her zeal for inquiry shaken for the present by the dexterous administration of this sugar-plum.

Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, xxxviii.

sugar-press (shùg'ür-pres), n. A press for extracting the juice of sugar-cane or effecting the drainage of molasses from sugar.

In the Islands of Hispania or Hispaniola were erected 28 sugar presses, to presse ye sugre which groweth plentifully in certain canes or reeds of the same country. R. Eden, tr. of Sebastian Munster (First Books on America, ed. Arber, p. 49).

sugar-refiner (shùg'ür-rē-fī'nēr), n. One who refines sugar.

sugar-refinery (shùg'ür-rē-fī'nēr-i), n. An establishment where sugar is refined; a sugar-house in which sugar is not only made from the raw syrup, but is also refined.

sugar-refining (shùg'ür-rē-fī'ning), n. The act or process of refining sugar.

sugar-sop (shùg'ür-sōp), n. A sugar-plum.

Dandle her upon my knee, and give her sugar-sops. Fletcher, Monsieur Thomas, II, 2.

Half our gettings

Must run in sugar-sops and nurses' wages now. Middleton, Chaste Maid, II, 2.

sugar-squirrel (shùg'ür-skur'el), n. The sciurine petaurist, Belidius sciureus, or another member of the same genus. See Belidius. These little marsupials closely resemble true flying-squirrels (as of the genus Sciuropterus, figured under flying-squirrel), but are near relatives of the opossum-mice, figured under Aerobates.

sugar-syrup (shùg'ür-sir'up), n. 1. The raw juice or sap of sugar-producing plants, roots, or trees.—2. In the manufacture and refining of sugar, a more or less concentrated solution of sugar.

sugar-teat (shùg'ür-tēt), n. Sugar tied up in a rag of linen of the shape and size of a woman's nipple, and moistened: given to an infant to quiet it.

sugar-tongs (shùg'ür-tōngz), n. sing. and pl. An implement having two arms, each furnished at the end with a flat or spoon-shaped plate or a cluster of claws, for use in lifting small lumps of sugar. It is usually made with a flexible back like that of shears for sheep. Also called sugar-nippers.

Or would our thrum-capp'd ancestors find fault For want of sugar-tongs, or spoons for salt? W. King, Art of Cookery, I, 70.

sugar-tree (shùg'ür-trō), n. 1. Any tree from which sugar-syrup or sugary sap can be obtained; particularly, the sugar-maple. See maple 1.—2. An Australian shrub or small tree, Myoporum platycarpum.

sugar-vinegar (shùg'ür-vīn'ē-gār), n. Vinegar made of the waste juice of sugar-cane.

sugary (shùg'ür-i), a. [Early mod. E. also sugrie; < sugar + -y.] 1. Resembling sugar in appearance or properties; containing or composed of sugar: sweet; sometimes, excessively or offensively sweet.—2. Fond of sugar or of sweet things: as, sugary palates.—3. Sweet in a figurative sense; honeyed; alluring; sometimes, deceitful.

And with the sugrie sweet thereof allure Chast ladies eares to fantasies impure. Spenser, Mother Hub. Tale, I, 820.

Walsingham bewailed the implicit confidence which the Queen placed in the sugary words of Alexander (Duke of Parma). Motley, Hist. Netherlands, II, 329.

sugary (shùg'ür-i), n. pl. sugaries (-riz). [For "sugaryery, < sugar + -ery.] An establishment where sugar is made; a sugar-house. [Rare.]

The primitive mode of arranging the sugary. New Amer. Farm Book, p. 272.

sugent (sū-jent), a. [< L. sugen(-t)s, ppr. of sugere, suck; see suck 1.] Sucking; imbibing; suetorial; fitted for or habitually sucking; as, a sugent process; a sugent animal.

Sugentia (sū-jen'shi-ā), n. pl. [NL. (Brandt): see sugent.] A suborder or an order of myriapods; the sugent or suetorial millepedes, having the opening of the sexual organs in the anterior part of the body; the families Polyzoniidae and Siphonophorida. Also Siphonizantia.

sugent (sū-jes'ent), a. [< L. sugere, suck, + -escent.] Fitted for sucking or imbibing; suetorial; suetorial; haustellate. Paley, Nat. Theol., xviii.

suggest (su-jest'), v. [< L. suggestus, pp. of suggerere (> R. suggerere = Sp. sugerir = Pg. suggerir = F. suggérer), carry or bring under, furnish, supply, produce, excite, advise, suggest, < sub, under, + gerere, bear, carry; see gerere. Cf. congest, digest, ingest, etc.] 1. trans. 1. To place before another's mind problematically; hint; intimate; insinuate; introduce to another's mind by the prompting of an indirect or mediate association.

Nature her self suggests the figure in this or that form; but art is worthy the judgment of his eye and application. Pottoluborn, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 249.

Fie, fie, Master Ford! are you not ashamed? What spirit, what devil suggests this imagination? Shak., M. W. of W., III, 3, 230.

Virgil . . . loves to suggest a truth indirectly, and, without giving us a full and open view of it, to let us see just so much as will naturally lead the imagination into all the parts that lie concealed. Addison, On Virgil's Georgics.

Sunderland, therefore, with exquisite cunning, suggested to his master the propriety of asking the only proof of obedience which it was quite certain that Rochester never would give. Maccubyn, Hist. Eng., vi.

2. To act, as an idea, so as to call up (another idea) by virtue either of an association or of a natural connection between the ideas.

The sight of part of a large building suggests the idea of the rest instantaneously. Hartley, Observations on Man, I, II, 10.

We all know that a certain kind of sound suggests immediately to the mind a coach passing in the street, and not only produces the imagination, but the belief, that a coach is passing. Reid, Inquiry into the Human Mind, II, vii.

3*ft.* To seduce; tempt; tempt away (from).

There's my purse: I give thee not this to suggest thee from thy master thou talkest of; serve him still. Shak., All's Well, iv, 5, 47.

I, Dametas, chief governor of all the royal cattle, and also of Pamela, whom thy master most perniciously hath suggested out of my dominion, do defy thee in a mortal affray. Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, III.

= Syn. 1. Intimate, insinuate, etc. See hint. 2. To indicate, prompt, advise, remind of.

II. intrans. To make suggestions; be tempting; present thoughts or motives with indirectness or with diffidence to the mind.

O sweet suggesting Love, if thou hast shun'd, Teach me, thy tempted subject, to excuse it. Shak., T. G. of V., II, 5, 7.

But ill for him who . . . ever weaker grows thro' acted crime, Or seeming-genial venial fault, Recurring and suggesting still! Tennyson, Will.

suggestable (su-jes'tā-bl), a. [< suggest + -able.] Same as suggestible.

suggestedness (su-jes'ted-nes), n. The state of being suggested. Bentham, Judicial Evidence, II, iv.

suggester (su-jes'tēr), n. [< suggest + -er.] One who or that which suggests. Also suggestor.

Some suborn'd suggester of these treasons. Fletcher (and others), Bloody Brother, III, 1.

suggestibility (su-jes'ti-bil'i-ti), n. [< suggestible + -ity (see -ility).] 1. Capability of being suggested.—2. A conforming social impulse, leading a person to believe what is emphatically asserted and to do what is imperatively commanded; credenceiveness and submissiveness; susceptibility to hypnotic suggestion.

A republic needs independent citizens, quick in comprehension, but slow in judgment, and tenacious in that which they have recognized as right. Every honest thinker must endeavor to counteract the suggestibility of the masses by the proper education of our people. Carus, Soul of Man, V, 10.

Suggestibility. The patient believes everything which his hypnotizer tells him, and does everything which the latter commands. W. James, Prin. of Psychol., II, 602.

suggestible (su-jes'ti-bl), a. [< suggest + -ible.] 1. Capable of being suggested.—2. Having great suggestibility; credenceive and submissive.

Professor Ricket tried on her some experiments of suggestion in the waking state, and found her somewhat suggestible. Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, Dec., 1890, p. 441.

suggestio falsi (su-jes'ti-ō fal'si), [L.: suggestio, a suggestion; falsi, gen. of falsum, falsehood, fraud; see suggestion and false, n.] An affirmative misrepresentation, whether by words, conduct, or artifice, as distinguished from a mere suppression of the truth; an indirect lie.

suggestion (su-jes'chən), n. [< F. suggestion = Sp. sugestión = Pg. sugestão = It. suggestione, < L. suggestio (n.), an addition, an intimation, < suggerere, pp. suggestus, supply, suggest; see suggest.] 1. The act of placing before the mind problematically; also, the idea so produced; the insinuation of an idea by indirect association; hint; intimation; prompting; also, especially, an incitement to an animal, brutal, or diabolical act.

For all the rest,
They'll take suggestion as a cat laps milk.
Shak., Tempest, ii. 1. 288.

He knew that by his preaching evident and certain good was done; but that there was any evil in his way of doing it, or likely to arise from it, was a thought which, if it had arisen in his own mind, he would immediately have ascribed to the suggestion of Satan.

Southey, Rune, p. 18.

2. The action of an idea in bringing another idea to mind, either through the force of association or by virtue of the natural connection of the ideas.

The other part of the invention, which I term suggestion, doth assign and direct us to certain marks or places which may excite our mind to return and produce such knowledge as it hath formerly collected, to the end we may make use thereof.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

Let it not be supposed that the terms suggest and suggestion are, in their psychological relation, of recent, or even modern, application; for, so applied, they are old—the oldest we possess. In this relative signification, suggero, the verb, ascends to Cicero; and suggestio, the noun, is a household expression of Tertullian and St. Augustine. Among the earlier modern philosophers, and in this precise application, they were, of course, familiar words—as is shown, among five hundred others, by the writings of Hieronymus Barbarus, the elder Scudiger, Melanchthon, Simonius, Campanella, to say nothing of the Schoolmen, etc. They were no strangers to Hobbes and Locke; and so far is Berkeley from having first employed them in this relation, as Mr. Stewart seems to suppose, Berkeley only did not continue what he found established and in common use.

Hamilton, Reid's Works, note D⁷.

[But the above is somewhat exaggerated. Suggestion was hardly in common use in this sense before Berkeley.]

It is by suggestion, not enumeration, that profound impressions are made upon the imagination.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 185.

3. Specifically, in hypnotism, the insinuation of a belief or impulse into the mind of the subject by any means, as by words or gestures, usually by emphatic declaration; also, the impulse of trust and submission which leads to the effectiveness of such incitement; also, the idea so suggested. Verbal suggestion is the usual method. Another is known as suggestion by attitude, as when, for instance, a person placed in the attitude of prayer is caused to pray.

Suggestion appears to be entirely a phenomenon of unconscious memory.

Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 511.

4. Indirect or hidden action.

This cardinal [Wolsey] . . . by craftie suggestion gat into his hands innumerable treasure.

Unlashed, Chron., III. 922.

5. In law, information without oath. (a) An information drawn in writing, showing cause to have a prohibition. (b) A statement or representation of some matter of fact entered upon the record of a suit at the instance of a party thereto, made by attorney or counsel without further evidence, usually called suggestion upon the record; a mode of proceeding allowed in some cases as to undisputed facts incidentally involved, such as the death of one of several plaintiffs, where the survivors are entitled to continue the action.—Negative suggestion, that form of hypnotic suggestion which results in lessened or suppressed activity, as abrogation of will-power, anesthesia of any kind, or inability to think, talk, act, etc.—Post-hypnotic suggestion, an impression made on a hypnotized person, persisting unrecognized for some time after the hypnotic condition is passed, and taking effect at the intended time.—Principle of suggestion, association of ideas. See association.—Relative suggestion, judgment.—Spontaneous suggestion. See spontaneous.—Syn. 1. Intimation, insinuation, etc. See hint, v. t.

suggestionism (su-jes'chon-izm), n. The doctrine that hypnotic persons are merely persons too trustful and submissive, and that the so-called hypnotic trance is merely a state in which these characters have been stimulated and distrust lulled.

suggestionist (su-jes'chon-ist), n. A person who accepts the theory of suggestionism.

suggestive (su-jes'tiv), a. and n. [F. suggestif = Pg. It. suggestivo; as suggest + -ive.] 1. a. 1. Containing a suggestion or hint; suggesting what does not appear on the surface; also, full of suggestion; stimulating reflection.

He [Bacon] is, throughout, and especially in his Essays, one of the most suggestive authors that ever wrote.

Whately, Pref. to Bacon's Essays.

"The king [of Uganda] habitually bears a couple of spears" is a duplication of weapons again suggestive, like the two swords, of a trophy tone presumably being taken from an enemy.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 402.

2. Of the nature of, or pertaining to, hypnotic suggestion.

Hypnotic or suggestive therapeutics.

Ejnorstrom, Hypnotism, p. 91.

II. n. Something intended to suggest ideas to the mind.

suggestively (su-jes'tiv-li), adv. In a suggestive manner; by way of suggestion; so as to suggest, or stimulate reflection.

suggestiveness (su-jes'tiv-nes), n. The state or character of being suggestive. New Princeton Rev., Nov., 1886, p. 364.

suggestion (su-jes'tment), n. [< suggest + -ment.] Suggestion. Imp. Dict. [Rare.]

suggestor (su-jes'tor), n. Same as suggester.

suggestress (su-jes'tres), n. [< suggester + -ess.] A female who suggests. De Quincy, [Rare.]

suggestum (su-jes'tum), n.; pl. suggesta (-tā), as E. suggestums (-tum). [L. < suggerere, pp. suggestus, carry or bring under; see suggest.] In Rom. antiq., a platform, stage, or tribune; a raised seat; a dais.

The ancient Suggestums, as I have often observed on medals, as well as on Constantine's arch, were made of wood, like a little kind of stage, for the heads of the nails are sometimes represented that are supposed to have fastened the boards together. We often see on them the emperor, and two or three general officers, sometimes sitting and sometimes standing, as they made speeches or distributed a congiary to the soldiers or people.

Addison, Remarks on Italy (Works, ed. Bohn, I. 402).

suggill (suj'il), v. t. [< OF. suggiller, < L. suggillare, also sugillare, beat black and blue, hence insult, revile.] 1. To beat black and blue.

Tho' we with blacks and blues are suggill'd,
Or, as the vulgar say, are cudgell'd.

S. Butler, Hudibras, I. iii. 1039.

2. To defame; sully; blacken.

Openly impugn'd or secretly suggill'd. Strype.

suggillate (suj'i-lāt), v. t. [< L. suggillatus, pp. of sugillare, beat black and blue; see suggill.] Same as suggill, l. Wiseman, Surgery.

sugillation (suj-i-lā'shon), n. [< F. sugillation = Sp. sugilación = Pg. sugilação, < L. sugillatione], sugillatione (-), a black-and-blue mark, a spot from a bruise, an affront; see sugillate.] A livid or black-and-blue mark; a blow; a bruise; ecchymosis; also applied to the spots which occur in disease and in incipient putrefaction.

sugh, n. An obsolete or Scotch form of sough.
sugi (sū'gē), n. [Jap.] A coniferous tree, Cryptomeria japonica, the Japan cedar. It is the largest tree of Japan, growing 120 feet high, with a long straight stem; the wood is compact, very white, soft, and easily worked, much used in house-building. It is found also in northern China and is locally planted as a timber-tree, but requires moist forest valleys for success.
suicidal (sū'i-si-dāl), a. [< suicide + -al.] Pertaining or being of the nature of the crime of suicide; suggestive of suicide; leading to suicide; as, suicidal mania; hence, figuratively, destructive of one's aims or interests; self-destructive; as, a suicidal business policy.

I am in the Downs. It's this unbearably dull, suicidal room—and old Boguey down-stairs, I suppose.

Dickens, Black House, xxii.

At the root of all suicidal tendencies lies an estimate of moral obligation and of the sacredness of human life entirely at variance with that introduced or sanctioned by the Gospel.

H. N. Ozendorn, Short Studies, p. 180.

suicidally (sū'i-si-dāl-i), adv. In a suicidal manner.

suicide (sū'i-sīd), n. [= F. suicide = Sp. Pg. It. suicida, *< NL. suicida, < L. sui, of oneself, + -ida, a killer, < cadere, kill.] One who commits suicide; at common law, one who, being of the years of discretion and of sound mind, destroys himself.

If fate forbears us, fancy strikes the blow;

We make misfortune, suicides in woe.

Young, Love of Fame, v.

suicide (sū'i-sīd), n. [= F. suicide = Sp. Pg. It. suicida, *< NL. suicidium, suicide, < L. sui, of oneself, + -idium, a killing, < cadere, kill.] 1. The act of designedly destroying one's own life. To constitute suicide at common law, the person must be of years of discretion and of sound mind. The word is by some writers used to include the act of one who, in maliciously attempting to kill another, occasions his own death, as where a man shoots at another and the gun bursts and kills himself. H. Stephen.

The argument which Plutarch and other writers derived from human dignity was that true courage is shown in the manful endurance of suffering, while suicide, being an act of flight, is an act of cowardice, and therefore unworthy of man.

Lecky, Europ. Morals, II. 46.

2. Figuratively, destruction of one's own interests or aims.

In countries pretending to civilisation there should be no wars, much less intestine war, which may be justly called political suicide.

F. Kaor, Works, V. 125.

suicide (sū'i-sīd), v. t. [< suicide, n.] To be guilty of suicide. [Slang.]

The wills which had been made by persons who suicided while under accusation were valid.

Quoted in N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 197.

suicidism (sū'i-si-dizm), n. [< suicide + -ism.] A disposition to suicide. Imp. Dict.

suicism (sū'i-sizm), n. [< L. sui, of oneself, + -icism; see egoism.] Selfishness; egotism; egoism; the opposite of altruism. [Rare.]

But his suicism was so grosse that any of Ahab's relations (whom he made run out of all they had) might read it.

R. Whitlock, Zootomia, p. 385. [Nares.]

Suidæ (sū'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. < Sus + -idæ.] The swine; the suiform or suilline quadrupeds, a family of setiferous artiodactyl (or even-toed) non-ruminant ungulate mammals, typified by the genus Sus. The family formerly contained all the swine, and corresponded to the three modern families—the Dicotylidæ or peccaries, the Phacochoeridæ or wart-hogs, and the Suidæ proper. In these last the palatomaxillary axis is scarcely deflected, or nearly parallel with the occipitosphenoïd axis; the basisphenoid is normal, without sinuses; the orbits are directed outward and forward; the malar bones are elongated, and expanded downward; and the dentition is normal, with 41 teeth. The restricted family contains, besides the genus Sus, the Indian Porculea, the African Potamochoerus or river-hog, and the Malayan Rabirusa. See cuts under habirusa, boar, peccary, Phacochoerus, and Potamochoerus.

suiform (sū'i-fōrm), a. [< L. sus, swine, + -forma, form.] Having the form or characters of the Suidæ; related to the swine; of or pertaining to the Suiformia.

Suiformia (sū-i-fōr'mi-ā), n. pl. [NL.: see suiform.] The suiform setiferous animals, or swine proper, represented by the Suidæ and Phacochoeridæ, as distinguished from the Dicotylidæ or Dicotylidæ. Gill.

sui generis (sū'i-jen'e-ris), [L.: sui, gen. of suus, his, her, its, their; generis, gen. of genus, kind; see genus.] Of his, her, its, or their own or peculiar kind; singular.

sui juris (sū'i-jū'ris), [L.: sui, gen. of suus, his, her, its, their; juris, gen. of ius, right, justice, duty; see jus.] 1. In Rom. law, the status of any one who was not subject to the patria potestas. S. E. Baldwin,—2. In modern legal usage, of full age and capacity, and legally capable of managing one's own affairs, as distinguished from infants, lunatics, and woman under common-law disqualifications of coverture.

suillager, n. Same as sullage.

suilline (sū'i-lin), a. and n. [< L. suillus, pertaining to swine, < sus, a hog, swine; see Sus.]

I. a. Swinish; pig-like; suiform; pertaining to the swine; as a suilline artiodactyl.

II. n. A swine.

Suinae (sū-i-nē), n. pl. [NL.: < Sus + -inae.] A subfamily of Suidæ, when the family name is used in a broad sense; same as Suidæ proper.

suine (sū'in), n. A preparation from beef-suet and lard; a mixture of oleomargarin with lard, refined cottonseed-oil, or other fatty substances, used as a substitute for butter.

suing (sū'ing), n. [Also sewing; < ME. sewingge; verbal n. of sue, v.] 1. Regular succession, order, or gradation; proportion.

Men may see on an apple-tree, many tyme and ofte,
Of a kynne apples men nat yliche grette,
Ne of sewingge smale ne of a swetnesse swete.

Piers Plowman (C), xix. 63.

2. The act or process of making or paying suit; wooing.—3. The act or process of prosecuting judicially; bringing suit.

suing (sū'ing), p. a. [< ME. sewingge; ppr. of sue, v.] 1. Following; ensuing.

The nyght sewingge, this white knyght cam to the 7

Lynages. Manderlyle, Travels, p. 225.

2. Conformable; in proportion.

I knew on her noon other lak
That al her lianes nere [were not] pure sewing.

Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 950.

suing (sū'ing), n. Same as sewing.

The percolation, or suing of the verjuice through the wood. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 79.

suingly (sū'ing-li), adv. [< ME. sewingly; < suing, p. a., + -ly.] In due order; afterward; later.

Now schalle I seye zou sewingly of Contrees and Yles that ben bezonde the Contrees that I have spoken of.

Manderlyle, Travels, p. 263.

suint (swint), n. [F.: see sandirer.] The natural grease of wool, consisting of insoluble soapy matter combined with a soluble salt containing from 15 to 33 per cent. of potash, which may be extracted commercially from the wool-washings.

suiriri (swi-rē'ri), n. [S. Amer.] A South American tyrannine bird of the genus Flaricola, as F. icterophrys; a watercap. See cut under Flaricola.

suist (sū'ist), n. [< L. sui, of himself, herself, itself, + -ist.] One who selfishly seeks his own gratification; a self-seeker; an egotist. [Rare.]

In short, a suist and self-projector (so far as known) is one the world would not care how soon he were gone; and when gone, one that Heaven will never receive; for thither I am sure he cometh not that would (like him) go thither alone. R. Whittlock, Zootonia, p. 383. (Nares.) suit (sūt), n. [Early mod. E. also suite, sute; < ME. sute, sute, sute, sute, < OF. suite, suite, sute, sute, sute, a following, pursuit, chase, action, series, suit, = Sp. seguida, f., seguido, m., = Pg. seguido, seguido, m., = It. seguito, f., seguito, m., a following, suit, etc., < ML. secuta, secuta, sequita*, a following, suit, etc., < L. sequi, pp. secutus, follow, pursue; see sue.] Cf. suite (swēt), the same word, from mod. F.] 1. A following; the act of pursuing, as game; pursuit.

Tho the sute sased after the swete hestes.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), I. 2615.

2. Series; succession; regular order.

There is a toy which I have heard, and I would not have it given over, but waited upon a little. They say it is observed in the Low Countries (I know not in what part) that every five and thirty years the same kind and sute of years and weathers comes about again.

Bacon, Vicissitudes of Things (ed. 1857), p. 566.

3. The act of suing; a seeking for something by solicitation or petition; an address of entreaty; petition; prayer.

They made wonderful earnest and importunate suit unto me, that I would teach and instruct them in that tongue and learning [the Greek].

Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), ii. 7.

Especially—(a) A petition made to a person of exalted station, as a prince or prelate.

And having a sute to the king, [he] met by chance with one Philino, a lover of wine and a merry companion in Court.

Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 112.

That swift-wing'd advocate, that did commence Our welcome suits before the King of Kings.

Quarles, Emblems, I. 15.

(b) Solicitation for a woman's hand in marriage; courtship; proposal of marriage.

Since many a wooer doth commence his suit To her he thinks not worthy.

Shak., Much Ado, ii. 3. 52.

Jer. Oh, here comes Isaac! I hope he has prospered in his suit.

Ferd. Doubtless that agreeable figure of his must have helped his suit surprisingly. Sheridan, The Duenna, ii. 3.

4. In law. (a) A proceeding in a court of justice for the enforcement or protection of a right or claim, or for the redress of a wrong; prosecution of a right or claim before any tribunal; as, a civil suit; a criminal suit; a suit in chancery. Suit is a very general term, more comprehensive than action, and includes both actions at law and bills in chancery. It usually includes special proceedings, such as mandamus.

Our lawyers, like Demosthenes, are mute,
And will not speak, though in a rightful sute,
Unless a golden kei unlocke their tongue.

Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 42.

In England the several suits or remedial instruments of justice are . . . distinguished into three kinds: actions personal, real, and mixed. Blackstone, Com., III. viii.

(b) The witnesses or followers of the plaintiff in an action at law.—5. In feudal law, a following or attendance. (a) Attendance by a tenant on his lord, especially at his court. (b) Attendance for the purpose of performing service. (c) The offspring, retinue, chattels, and appurtenances of a vassal.

6. A company of attendants or followers; train; retinue. Now commonly suite.

So come in sodanly a senator of Rome,
Wyth sextene knyghtes in a sute sewande hym one.

Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I. 81.

Had there not come in Tydus and Telenor, with fortie or fiftie in their sute, to the defence.

Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, ii.

7. A number of things composing a sequence or succession; a number of things of a like kind that follow in a series and are intended to be used together; a set or suite; specifically, one of the four sets or classes, known as spades, clubs, hearts, and diamonds, into which playing-cards are divided.

Leaving the ancient game of England (Trumpe), where every coate and sute are sorted in their degree, [they] are running to Ruffe. Martinus Monachus (1589), Epistle (to the Reader). (Nares.)

I have chosen one from each of the different suits, namely, the King of Clubines, the Queen of Rabbits, the Knave of Pinks, and the Ace of Roses; which answered to the spades, the clubs, the diamonds, and the hearts of the moderns.

Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 432.

The cards don't cheat, . . . and there is nothing so flattering in the world as a good sute of trumps.

Thackeray, Virginians, xxx.

8. A number of different objects intended to be used together, especially when made of similar materials and corresponding in general character and purpose; thus, a number of different garments designed to be worn together form a suit of clothes; a number of sails of different sizes and fitting different spars form a suit of sails.

suite (sūt), in present use (defs. 2, 3, etc.), like mod. F., swēt), n. [In earlier use a form of suit; in recent use, < F. suite, a following, suit, suite; see suit.] 1. An obsolete form of suit (in various senses).—2. A company of attendants or followers; retinue; train; as, the suite of an ambassador.

Not being allowed to take more than 2,000 followers in the king's suite, they nevertheless had evidently entertained a scheme of arming a greater number.

J. Guider, Richard III., ii.

3. A number of things taken collectively and constituting a sequence or following in a series; a set; a collection of things of like kind and intended to be used together; as, a suite of rooms; a suite of furniture.

Through his red lips his laughter exposed a suite of fair white teeth.

S. Judd, Margaret, i. 2.

The careful examination of large suites of specimens revealed an unexpected amount of variability in species.

Huxley, Emys, Brit., II. 49.

Two other courts, on whose sides are extended what may be called three complete suites of apartments, very similar to each other in arrangement, though varied in dimensions.

J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., I. 173.

4. A sequel. [Rare.]

I had always intended to write an account of the "Conquest of Mexico," as a suite to my "Columbus," but left Spain without making the requisite researches.

Irring, to Prescott, in Tiecknor's Prescott, p. 15s.

5. In music, a set or series of instrumental dances, either in the same or in related keys, usually preceded by a prelude, and variously grouped so as to secure variety and contrast. Suites were the earliest form of instrumental work in detached movements, and continued in favor from the beginning of the seventeenth to the end of the eighteenth century, though sometimes known by other names. They included a great variety of dances, notably the allemande, courante, sarabande, and gigue, together with the gavotte, passepied, branle, and minuet. The early suite was not fully distinguishable from the early sonata, and the developed suite finally gave place to the modern sonata, though the true sonata form as a method of construction did not belong to the suite. Suites are properly for a single instrument, like the harpsichord or clavichord, but are sometimes written for an orchestra. The suite form has lately been revived. Among modern writers of orchestral music in suite form are Lachner, Raff, Bizet, Dvorák, and Moszkowski.

suites, v. See suit.

suites (sū'tēr), n. Same as suit.

suithold (sūt'hōld), n. [< suit + hold.] In feudal law, a tenure in consideration of certain services to the superior lord.

Sulcate Stems.
1. Stem of Equisetum arvense. 2. Stem of A. hyemale.

Soom synck too bottoms, sulking the surges asunder.
Stanishurst, Aeneid, i. 117. (Davies.)

sulkily (sul'ki-li), adv. In a sulky manner; sullenly; morosely.

sulkiness (sul'ki-nes), n. The state or quality of being sulky; sullenness; moroseness.

sulky (sul'ki), a. [An extended form of sulk, a., due in part to the noun sulkiness, now regarded as < sulky + -ness, but earlier sulkiness, *< ME. solkness, < AS. solernes, solernes; see sulk, a.] 1. Silently resentful; dogged; morose; sullen; moody; disposed to keep aloof from society, or to repel the friendly advances of others.

It is surely better to be even weak than malignant or sulky.
F. Knox, Essays (1777), No. 123.

During the time he was in the house he seemed sulky or rather stupid.
Hudson, Insanity, x.

Corydon, offended with Phyllis, becomes, as far as she is concerned, a mere drivelling idiot, and a sulky one into the bargain.
W. H. Melville, White Rose, II. xviii.

The true zeal and patience of a quarter of an hour are better than the sulky and inattentive labour of a whole day.
Ruskin, Elements of Drawing, ii.

2. Stunted, or of backward growth; noting a condition of a plant, sometimes resulting from insect injury.

The condition called sulky as applied to a tea-bush is unfortunately only too common on many estates.
E. Ernest Green, in Ceylon Independent, 1889.

=Syn. 1. Morose, Splenetic, etc. (see sullen); cross, spleenish, perverse, cross-grained, out of humor.

sulky (sul'ki), n.; pl. sulkies (-kiz). [So called because it obliges the rider to be alone; < sulky, a.] A light two-wheeled carriage for one person, drawn by one horse, commonly used for trials of speed between trotting-horses.

The country doctor . . .
Whose ancient sulky down the village lanes
Dragged, like a war-car, captive ills and pains.
Waltier, The Countess.

sulky-cultivator, sulky-rake (sul'ki-kul-ti-vā-tor, -rāk), n. A cultivator or a horse-rake having a seat for the driver. See under rake.

sulky-harrow, sulky-scraper (sul'ki-har-ō, -skrā'pēr), n. A harrow or scraper mounted on a wheeled carriage, and having a seat for the driver.

April 3, 1712. A grant unto Israel Pownoll of his new invented engine or machine for taking up ballast, sullage, sand, etc., of very great use in cleansing rivers, harbours, etc.
Ashton, Social Life in the Reign of Queen Anne, II. 57.

sullage-piece (sul'āj-pēs), n. In founding, a deadhead. E. H. Knight.

Sullan (sul'an), a. [< L. Sullanus, < Sulla, improp. Sylla, Sulla (see def.)] Of or pertaining to Lucius Cornelius Sulla (138-78 B. C.), a Roman general and dictator.

In 70 B. C. Pompeius, in conjunction with Crassus, repealed the Sullan constitution.
Encyc. Brit., IV. 634.

sullen (sul'en), a. and n. [< ME. sollein, sollein, soleyne, solain, < OF. solain (= Pr. solain), solitary, lonely; as a noun, a pittance for one person; *< ML. as if solanus, < L. solus, alone; see sol.] 1. a. 1. Being alone; solitary; lonely; hence, single; unmarried.

Lat ech of hem be soleyne al her lyve,
Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 607.

That ofte, when I shulde play,
It maketh me drawe out of the way
In soleyne place by my solve,
As doth a laborer to delve.
Gower, Conf. Amant, vi.

2. Being but one; unique; hence, rare; remarkable.

Trewely she was to min ye
The soleyne fenix of Arabye.
Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 982.

Ye shall find this solain adventure
Full strang unto sight of ech creature.
Rom. of Parthenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 5431.

3. Remaining alone through ill humor; unsocial; silent and cross; sulky; morose; glum.

Still is he sullen, still he lours and frets.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 75.

Shak., R. and J., iv. 5. 88.

6. Slow-moving; sluggish; dull; as, a sullen pace.

When death's cold, sullen stream
Shall o'er me roll.
Ray Palmer, My Faith Looks up to Thee.

7. Malignant; unpropitious; foreboding ill; baleful.

Such sullen planets at my birth did shine,
They threaten every fortune mixt with mine.
Dryden.

She meets again
The savage murderer's sullen gaze.
Whittier, Mogg Megone, i.

=Syn. 3. Gloomy, Sullen, Sulky, Morose, Splenetic. These words are arranged in the order of their intensity and of their degrees of activity toward others. Gloomy has the figurative suggestion of physical gloom or darkness; the gloomy man has little brightness in his mind, or he sees little light ahead. The sullen man is silent because he is sluggishly angry and somewhat bitter, and he repels friendly advances by silence and a lowering aspect rather than by words. The sulky person persists in being sullen beyond all reason and for mere whim: the young are often sulky. In the morose man there is an element of hate, and he meets advances with rudeness or cruel words: the young have rarely development of character enough to be morose. The splenetic man is sulky and peevish, with frequent outbursts of irritation venting itself upon persons or things. Any of these words may indicate either a temporary mood or a strong tendency of nature.

II. n. 1. A solitary person; a recluse.

He sit nother with seynt Iohan, with Symon, we with Jude. . . .
Eote as a soleyne by hym-self. Piers Plowman (C), xv. 145.

2. pl. Sullen feelings; sulks; sullenness. [Colloq.]

Let them die that age and sullen have.
Shak., Rich. II., ii. 1. 139.

If she be not sick of the sullen, I see not
The least infirmity in her.
Massinger, Emperor of the East, iii. 4.

Being ourself but lately recovered—we whisper it in confidence, reader—out of a long and desperate fit of the sullen.
Lamb, Popular Fallacies, xvi.

3. a. A meal for one person. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

sullen† (sul'en), v. t. [< sullen, a.] To make sullen, morose, or sulky.

In the body of the world, when members are sullen'd, and snarl one at another, down falls the frame of all.
Feltham, Resolves, i. 80.

sullenly (sul'en-li), adv. In a sullen manner; gloomily; with moroseness.

sullenness (sul'en-nes), n. 1. The state or quality of being sullen.

The form which her anger assumed was sullenness.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vii.

2. Silence; reserve.

Her very Coyness warms:
And with a grateful Sullenness she charms.
Congreve, Paraphrase upon Horace, l. xix. 1.

=Syn. 1. See sullen.

sullen-sick† (sul'en-sik), a. Sick with sullenness.

On the denyall, Ahab falls sullen-sick.
Fuller, Pisgah Sight, II. vii. 7. (Davies.)

sully† (sul'g-ri), n. [< sull + -ry.] A plowland.

sullevat† (sul'ē-vāt), v. t. [Also sullevate; < L. sublevatus, pp. of sublevare (> lt. sollevare = Pg. Sp. Pr. solcar = F. soulever), lift up from beneath, support, assist. < sub, under, + levare, lift up, raise, < lev, light, not heavy; see levity. Cf. chevate.] To cause to rise in insurrection; excite, as to sedition.

I come to shew the Fruits of Connivance, or rather Encouragement, from the Magistrats in the City, upon other Occasions, to sully the Bible.

Register North Examen, p. 114.

sulliage† (sul'i-āj), n. [A var. of sullage, as if < sully + -age.] Same as sullage.

Till we are in some degree reformed from the dross and sullage of our former lives in our sins.

Evelyn, True Religion, l. 243.

sullov† (sul'vō), n. [Also sull; < ME. soluar, solah, solh, < AS. solh, rarely sul (gen. sulas, dat. syl; in comp. sulh, sul), a plow. Cf. L. sulcus, a furrow; see sulcus, sull.] A plow. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

sullov†, v. t. [A var. of sully.] To sully.

sully (sul'i), v.; pret. and pp. sulled, sully, sullying. [Early mod. E. also sulhar; < ME. soluan, < AS. syltan, sully, defile, be-mire (= OS. soluan = MD. soluan = OHG. hi-sulian, G. soluh, n. sully, = Sw. sōla = Dan. sōle = Goth. bi-suljan, be-mire), < sol = OHG. sol, MHG. sol, sol, G. soluh = Dan. sōl, mire. The form sully is prob. due in part to the OF. solliar, souiller, etc., soil, sully; see soil, with which sully is often confused.] 1. trans. 1. To soil; stain; tarnish; defile.

Over it perpetually burneth a number of kumps, which have sulled the roof like the inside of a chimney.

Sandys, Travails, p. 120.

And statues sully'd yet with sacrilegious smoke.

Roscommon, trans. of Horace's Sixth Ode (of bk. iii.).

One of the great charms of this temple [the great Vaishnava temple at Seringham], when I visited it, was its purity. Neither whitewash nor red nor yellow paint had then sullied it, and the time-stain on the warm-coloured granite was all that relieved its monotony.

J. Ferguson, Hist. Indian Arch, p. 365.

2. Figuratively, to stain or tarnish morally.

The over-daring Talbot
Hath sullied all his gloss of former honour
By this unheeded, desperate, wild adventure.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iv. 4. 6.

A look and a word . . . seemed to flash upon me the conviction that the woman I loved was sullied.

T. Winthrop, Cecil Dreeme, vi.

3. To dim; darken.

Let there be no spots in these our feasts of charity; nothing that may sull the brightness and damp the cheerfulness of this day's solemnity.

Ep. Atterbury, Sermons, l. xviii.

Weakened our national strength and sullied our glory abroad.

Bolingbroke, Parties, i.

II. intrans. To be or become soiled or tarnished.

Silvering will sully and canker more than gilding.

Bacon.

sully (sul'i), n.; pl. sullies (-iz). [< sully, v.] Soil; tarnish; spot.

A noble and triumphant merit breaks through little spots and sullies on his reputation.

Spectator.

sulphacid (sul'f-as'id), n. [< sulph(ur) + acid.] An acid in which sulphur takes the place of oxygen; a sulpho-acid.

sulphamate (sul'fa-māt), n. See sulphamic.

sulphamic (sul-fam'ik), a. [< sulph(ur) + am(-monium) + -ic.] Having sulphur and ammonium as the characteristic constituents.—Sulphamic acid, an acid the ammonium salt of which is produced by the action of dry ammonia on dry sulphur trioxide. It may be regarded as sulphuric acid in which one OH group is replaced by NH₂; thus, SO₃(OH)NH₂. It is a monobasic acid, forming salts called sulphamates; of these ammonium sulphamate, SO₃(NH₄)NH₂, is one of the best-known.

sulphamide (sul'fa-mid or -mid), n. [< sulph(ur) + am(-monia) + -ide.] A compound which may be regarded as consisting of the group SO₂ combined with two amido-groups, NH₂.

sulpharsin (sul'fār-sin), n. [< sulph(ur) + arsine.] Caecyl sulphid, (CH₃)₂As₂S₃, a colorless liquid having an intensely disagreeable smell and being highly inflammable.

sulphate (sul'fat), n. [= F. sulfat = Sp. Pg. sulfato = It. solfato, < NL. sulphatum, sulfatum; as sulph(ur) + -at.] A salt of sulphuric acid. The acid is dibasic, forming two classes of salts—neutral sulphates, in which both hydrogen atoms of the acid are replaced by basic radicals, and acid sulphates, in which only one of the hydrogen atoms is so replaced. Most sulphates are readily soluble in water, while a few, as calcium, strontium, and lead sulphates, are very sparingly soluble, and barium sulphate is insoluble in water and dilute acids. The sulphates are widely and abundantly distributed in nature. Gypsum and anhydrite are calcium sulphates. Epsom salts and Glauber salts, contained in all sea-waters, are magnesium sulphate and sodium sulphate respectively. Barytes or heavy spar, used on account of its high specific gravity (4.3 to 4.7) as an adulterant and makeweight, is barium sulphate. Anglesite, or lead sulphate, is an ore of lead. Many other sulphates occur in nature in smaller quantity. Of the sulphates artificially prepared may be mentioned sodium sulphate, or salt-cake (made from salt on an enormous scale as the first step in the manufacture of sodium carbonate), and ammonium sulphate (made extensively from gas liquor, and used for preparing other ammonia salts and as a fertilizer). Zinc sulphate, or white vitriol, is used in medicine as an astringent and a tonic, and in larger doses as an emetic. In overdoses it acts as an irritant poison. Copper sulphate, or blue vitriol, is made on an enormous scale, and is used in preparing pigments (e.g. cerulean green, Paris green, etc.), in calico-printing, in electro-metallurgy, and in horticulture, particularly by vineyardists, as a fungicide. It is used in medicine, chiefly as a feeble escharotic for exuberant granulations, and as a local stimulant. Aluminium sulphate, called concentrated alum or sulphate of alumina, is used as a mordant and make-weight and for preparing alums. Ferrous sulphate, or green vitriol, is used as a mordant and for the manufacture of inks, Prussian blue, etc. The alkalis morphine, atropine, quinine, etc., are generally administered in the form of sulphates.—Carbyl sulphate. Same as thionic anhydride (which see, under ethionics).—Ethyl sulphate. See sulphuric ether, under sulphuric.—Precipitated sulphate of iron. See precipitate.—Sulphate of indigo. See indigo.

sulphate (sul'fat), v.; pret. and pp. sulphated, pp. sulphating. [< sulphate, n.] I. trans. 1. To form a deposit of lead sulphate on, as a lead plate or plates of a secondary battery or a secondary cell.—2. To convert (red lead used as a coloring material, as on plaecards) into lead sulphate by means of dilute sulphuric acid.—Sulphated oil. See castor-oil.

II. intrans. To form a sulphate (especially a lead sulphate) deposit.

The sodium salt diminishes the chance of objectionable sulphating in the cell. Philos. Mag., XXX, 162.

sulphatic (sul-fat'ik), a. [< sulphate + -ic.] Relating to, containing, or resembling a sulphate.

sulphatite (sul'fat-it), n. [< sulphate + -ite².] A name sometimes given to native sulphuric acid, present in certain mineral waters.

sulphur, n. An obsolete spelling of sulphur.

sulphid, sulphide (sul'fid, -fid or -fid), n. [< sulph(ur) + -id¹, -ide¹.] A combination of sulphur with another more electropositive element, or with a body which can take the place of such an element. Also sulphuret, hydrosulphid, hydrosulphuret.—Allyl, golden, hydrogen, etc., sulphid. See the qualifying words.

sulphindigotic (sul-in-di-got'ik), a. Same as sulphoindigotic.

sulphion (sul'fi-on), n. [< sulph(ur) + -ion.] A hypothetical body consisting of one equivalent of sulphur and four of oxygen; so called in reference to the binary theory of salts. Graham.

sulphonide (sul'fi-ō-uid or -nīd), n. [< sulphurion + Gr. eidos, form, resemblance: see -ide¹.] In the binary theory of salts, a compound of sulphur with a metal, or with a body representing a metal; as, sulphonide of sodium, otherwise called sodium sulphate. Graham.

sulphite (sul'fit), n. [= F. sulfite; as sulph(ur) + -ite².] A salt of sulphurous acid. The sulphites are recognized by giving off the suffocating smell of sulphurous acid when acted on by a stronger acid. A very close analogy exists between them and the carbonates.—Sulphite pulp, in paper-manuf., pulp made from wood, straw, esparto, and other vegetable products, by the action of a solution of a sulphite of an alkaline earth, as lime, or of an alkali, as soda, that contains an excess of sulphurous acid.

sulpho-acid (sul'fō-as'id), n. [< sulph(ur) + acid.] In chem., an acid which contains the group SO₂.OH united to carbon. Also called sulphonic acid. The term has also been used for a class of acids in which sulphur is substituted for oxygen, now called thio-acids; as, thiosulphuric acid, H₂S₂O₃, which may be regarded as sulphuric acid in which one oxygen atom has been replaced by sulphur.

sulphocyanate (sul'fō-si-a-nāt), n. [< sulphocyanic + -ate¹.] A salt of sulphocyanic acid.

sulphocyanic (sul'fō-si-an'ik), a. [< sulphocyanogen + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or containing sulphur and cyanogen, or derived from sulphocyanogen.—Sulphocyanic acid, CNHS, an acid occurring in the seeds and blossoms of cruciferous plants, and in the saliva of man and the sheep. It is a colorless liquid of a pure acid taste, and smells somewhat like vinegar. It colors the salts of peroxid of iron blood-red. It yields salts called sulphocyanates, or sometimes sulphocyanides. Also called rhodanic acid.

sulphocyanide (sul'fō-si-a-nīd or -nīd), n. [< sulphocyanic + -ide².] Same as sulphocyanate.

sulphocyanogen (sul'fō-si-an'ō-jen), n. [< sulph(ur) + cyanogen.] A compound of sulphur and cyanogen, (CN)₂S, also called sulphocyanic anhydride. It is obtained in the form of a deep-yellow amorphous powder, insoluble in water, alcohol, or ether, but soluble in strong sulphuric acid.

sulphohalite (sul'fō-hā-lit), n. [< sulph(ur) + Gr. uros, salt, + -ite².] A mineral occurring in transparent rhombic dodecahedrons of a pale greenish-yellow color. It consists of the sulphate and chlorid of sodium in the ratio of 3 to 2. It is found at Borax Lake, in the northwest corner of San Bernardino county, California.

sulphohydrate (sul'fō-hī-drāt), n. [< sulph(ur) + hydr(o)gen + -ate².] A compound consisting of any element or radical united with the radical SH, which contains one atom of sulphur and one of hydrogen; as, calcium sulphohydrate, Ca(SH)₂. Also sulphhydrate.

sulphoindigotic (sul'fō-in-di-got'ik), a. [< sulph(ur) + indigo + -ic.] Pertaining to, derived from, or containing sulphuric acid and indigo. Also sulphindigotic.—Sulphoindigotic acid, C₁₂H₁₀SO₈, an acid formed by the action of sulphuric acid on indigo. When 1 part of pure indigo is added to 8 parts of sulphuric acid, the addition of water causes the deposition of a purple powder called sulphopurpuric acid, while a blue solution is obtained. The blue solution contains two acids, sulphoindigotic acid and hyposulphoindigotic acid.

sulphonal (sul'fō-nāl), n. Diethyl sulphon-dimethyl-methane, (C₂H₅)₂C(C₂H₅SO₂)₂, a hypnotic of considerable value.

sulphonate (sul'fō-nāt), n. [< sulphonic + -ate¹.] A salt of sulphonic acid.

sulphonation (sul'fō-nā'shon), n. [< sulphonate + -ion.] The act of introducing into a compound, by substitution, the acid radical SO₂.OH.

sulphonic (sul'fō-n'ik), a. [< sulph(ur) + -on-ic.] Containing the acid radical SO₂.OH.—Sulphonic acid. Same as sulpho-acid.

sulphopurpuric (sul'fō-pēr-pū'rik), a. [< sulph(ur) + purpuric.] Noting an acid obtained by the action of sulphuric acid on indigo. See sulphoindigotic acid, under sulphoindigotic.

sulpho-salt (sul'fō-sāl't), n. [< sulph(ur) + salt.] A salt of a sulpho-acid. Also sulphur-salt, sulphusalt.

sulphosol (sul'fō-sōl), n. [< sulph(ur) + F. sol, < L. sol, salt: see salt.] Same as sulpho-salt.

sulphovinate (sul'fō-vī-nāt), n. [< sulphur-in-ic + -ate¹.] A salt of sulphovinic acid.

sulphovinic (sul'fō-vīn'ik), a. [< sulph(ur) + L. vinum, wine, + -ic.] Pertaining to, derived from, or containing sulphuric acid and alcohol, or spirit of wine.—Sulphovinic acid, C₂H₅HSO₄, ethyl hydrogen sulphate, or ethyl sulphuric acid, a colorless oily liquid with strong acid properties, prepared by the reaction of oil of vitriol on alcohol. It may be regarded as sulphuric acid in which one hydrogen atom has been replaced by the radical ethyl C₂H₅. It is a monobasic acid, and forms a series of crystallizable salts.

sulphur (sul'fēr), n. and a. [Early mod. E. sulphur, sulfur; < ME. sulphur, sulfur; < D. solfer, solfer, solfr, solfr, solfr, later also sulphur, F. soufre = Pr. sulfre, sulfre, solpre = Cat. sofre = OSP. sufre, acufre, Sp. azufre = It. zofre, enrofre, also sulfur = It. solfo = G. sulfur, < L. sulfur, also sulphur, sulpar, sulphur; cf. late Skt. śulvāri (according to a favorite fancy, lit. 'hostile to copper,' < śulva, copper, + -ari, enemy), sulphur (prob. a borrowed word). The AS. name was sweftel = D. zwart = OHG. sweftel, swechal, MHG. sweftel, swechal, G. schwefel = Sw. svafvel (< D.) = Goth. swibils, sulphur; prob. not akin to the L. name.] I. n. 1. Chemical symbol, S; atomic weight, 32.06. An elementary substance which occurs in nature as a brittle crystalline solid, with resinous luster, almost tasteless, and emitting when rubbed or warmed a peculiar characteristic odor. It is a non-conductor of electricity. Its specific gravity is 2.06. It is insoluble in water, nearly so in alcohol and ether, but quite soluble in carbon disulphid, petroleum, benzine, etc. It burns in the air with a blue flame, and is oxidized to sulphur dioxide or sulphurous acid. It melts at 238° F., and boils at 824° F., giving off a dense red vapor. Sulphur exists in two distinct crystalline forms, and also as an amorphous variety; these modifications are characterized by differences in specific gravity, in solubility in various liquids, and in many other respects. Between its melting-point and 280° F. it is most fluid, and when cast in wooden molds it forms the stick-sulphur or brimstone of commerce. Between 430° and 450° it becomes much less liquid, and can with difficulty be poured. If poured into water, it forms a ductile mass called plastic sulphur, which may be used for taking impressions of coins, etc. On standing it becomes hard and brittle. From 450° to its boiling-point it is liquid again. Sulphur occurs in great abundance and purity in the neighborhood of active and extinct volcanoes. As an article of commerce, most of it is brought from Sicily. It is also widely distributed in combination with other elements, chiefly in the form of sulphates and sulphids, and it is now extensively obtained from the native sulphids of iron and copper for use in the manufacture of sulphuric acid. It also occurs sparingly in animal and vegetable tissues. Sulphur combines with oxygen, hydrogen, chlorine, etc., to form important compounds, of great use in the arts. It is used in the pure state extensively in the manufacture of gunpowder and matches, and for vulcanizing rubber. Refined sulphur, prepared by sublimation from the crude substance, is used in medicine as a laxative, diaphoretic, and resolvent; it is also largely employed in skin-diseases, both internally and externally. From the sixteenth to the eighteenth century casts or copies of antique gems were frequently made by pouring into a mold melted sulphur colored with metallic oxides.

2. The supposed substance of lightning.

To tear with thunder the wide cheeks of the air,
And yet to charge thy sulphur with a bolt
That should but rive an oak. Shak., Cor., v. 3, 152.

3. In zool., one of many different pieridine butterflies; a yellow pierian. These butterflies are of some shade of yellow, blanching to nearly white, or deepening to orange, and more or less marked with black.

They represent several genera. Colias philodice of the United States is the clouded sulphur; Callitryx eubule is the cloudless sulphur. The former is one of the commonest of North American butterflies, often seen in flocks along roads, settling about mud-puddles and other moist spots. Its larva feeds upon clover. See cuts under Colias, Pieris, and cabbage-butterfly.—Anisated sulphur balsam, an electuary composed of oil of anise 5 parts, sulphur balsam 1 part.—Barbados sulphur balsam, a balsam composed of sulphur boiled with Barbados tur.—Clouded, cloudless sulphur. See def. 3.—Crude sulphur, the product of the distillation of native sulphur.—Flowers of sulphur, a yellow powder formed by condensing the vapor of sulphur.—Liver of sulphur. See liver.—Milk of sulphur, a white impalpable powder made by dissolving sulphur in a solution of milk of lime and adding muriatic acid. Hydrogen sulphid is set free, and sulphur is precipitated.—Precipitated sulphur. See precipitate.—Roll- or stick-sulphur, sulphur refined and cast in wooden molds.—Ruby sulphur. Same as realgar.—Soft sulphur, an allotropic form of sulphur produced by heating ordinary sulphur to 300° F. and pouring it into water. It remains for some days soft and waxy, and then resumes a hard, brittle condition.—Stones of sulphur, thunderbolts.

The gods throw stones of sulphur on me, if
That box I gave you was not thought by me
A precious thing. Shak., Cymbeline, v. 5, 240.

Sulphur balsam, a balsam composed of 1 part of sulphur dissolved in 8 parts of olive- or linseed-oil.—Sulphur-bath, a bath to which a pound of the flowers of sulphur has been added; used in the treatment of skin-diseases.—Sulphur group, the elementary substances sulphur, selenium, and tellurium; all have a strong attraction for oxygen.—Sulphur ointment. See ointment.—Vegetable sulphur. Same as lycopode.

II. a. Of the color of brimstone, or stick-sulphur; of a very greenish, excessively luminous, and highly chromatic yellow; used in zoölogy in many obvious compounds; as, sulphur-bellied; sulphur-crested. A color-disk of two thirds bright chrome-yellow and one third emerald-green gives a somewhat dull sulphur-yellow.

sulphur (sul'fēr), v. t. [< sulphur, n.] To apply sulphur to; also, to fume with sulphur; sulphurate.

Immediately after or about the time they blossom, the vines are sulphured, to keep off the Oidium, which disease is still active in Portugal. Encyc. Brit., XXIV, 608.

sulphurate (sul'fū-rāt), a. and n. [< L. sulfuratus, sulphuratus, impregnated with sulphur, < sulfur, sulphur; see sulphur.] I. a. Mingled with sulphur; of the yellow color of sulphur.

A pale sulphurate colour.
Dr. H. More, Mystery of Gedliness, p. 189.

II. n. A sulphid; as, sulphurate of anti-mony, Sb₂S₃.

sulphurated (sul'fū-rāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. sulphurated, pp. sulphurating. [< sulphur + -ate².] To impregnate or combine with sulphur; also, to subject to the action of sulphur.

sulphuration (sul'fū-rā'shon), n. [< L. sulfuratione(n-), sulphuratio(n-), a vein of sulphur, < sulfuratus, sulphuratus, impregnated with sulphur; see sulphurate.] 1. The act of dressing or anointing with sulphur. Bentley, On Free-thinking, § 50.—2. The act or process of impregnating, combining, or fumigating with sulphur; specifically, the subjection of a substance, such as straw-plait, silks, and woollens, to the action of sulphur or its fumes for the purpose of bleaching; also, the state of being impregnated with sulphur. Also sulphurization, sulphurisation.

sulphurator (sul'fū-rā-tor), n. [< sulphurate + -or¹.] An apparatus for impregnating with sulphur or exposing to the action of the fumes of sulphur, especially for fumigating or bleaching by means of burning sulphur.

sulphur-bottom (sul'fēr-bot'um), n. The sulphur-bellied whale of the Pacific, a rorqual, Balaenoptera (or Sibbaldius) sulphurea. Also sulphur-whale.

sulphur-concrete (sul'fēr-kon'krēt), n. A mixture of sulphur with pulverized stoneware and glass, melted and run into molds. At 230° F. it becomes exceedingly hard, remains solid in boiling water, and resists water and acids. It is used to cement stones, melting readily at about 248° F.

sulphureity (sul'fū-rē'ī-ti), n. [< sulphureous + -ity.] The state of being sulphureous. B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 1. [Rare.]

sulphureous (sul'fū-rē-us), a. [< L. sulfureus, sulphureus, of or like sulphur, < sulfur, sulphur; see sulphur.] 1. Consisting of sulphur; having the qualities of sulphur or brimstone; impregnated with sulphur; sulphureous.

He belches poison forth, poison of the pit,
Brimstone, hellish and sulphureous poison.
Randolph, Muses' Looking-Glass, iv. 5.

The room was filled with a sulphureous smell.
Barham, Tingoldby Legends, I, 105.

2. In bot., sulphur-colored; of a pale bright yellow.

sulphureously (sul'fū-rē-us-li), adv. In a sulphureous manner; especially, with the odor of sulphur, or with the stifling fumes or the heat of burning sulphur.

Aden is seated low, sulphureously shaded by a high barren Mountain, whose brazen front, scorching the miserable Towne, yields a perfect character of Turkish baseness.

Sir T. Herbert, Travels (ed. 1638), p. 31.

sulphureousness (sul-fū'rē-us-nēs), n. The state or property of being sulphureous.

sulphuret (sul-fū-ret), n. [< sulphur + -et.]

Same as sulphid.

sulphureted, sulphuretted (sul-fū-ret-ed), a.

Having sulphur in combination. Also sulphydric.

—Sulphureted bath, a bath, used in the treatment of scabies and eczema, consisting of 3 ounces of potassium, calcium, or sodium sulphid in 40 gallons of water.—Sulphureted hydrogen. See hydrogen.

sulphuric (sul-fū'rik), a. [= F. sulfurique = Sp. sulfurico = Pg. sulphurico = It. solforico, < NL. sulfuricus, sulphuricus; as sulphur + -ic.] Of or pertaining to or obtained from sulphur.—

Sulphuric acid, H_2SO_4 , oil of vitriol, a dense oily colorless fluid, having, when strongly concentrated, a specific gravity of about 1.8. It is exceedingly acid and corrosive, decomposing all animal and vegetable substances by the aid of heat. It has a very great affinity for water, and unites with it in every proportion, evolving at the same time great heat; it attracts moisture strongly from the atmosphere, becoming rapidly weaker if exposed. When the concentrated acid is heated, sulphur trioxide is given off, and at about 640° F. it boils and distills unchanged. The sulphuric acid of commerce is never pure, but may contain lead sulphate dissolved from the lead chambers during the process of manufacture, arsenic, and other impurities. It was formerly prepared by the distillation of dried iron sulphate, called green vitriol, whence the corrosive liquid which came over in the distillation, having an oily consistence, was called oil of vitriol. It is now prepared in the United States and most other countries by burning sulphur, or frequently iron pyrites, in closed furnaces, and leading the fumes, mixed with oxides of nitrogen, into large leaden chambers, into which jets of steam are continuously sent. The oxides of nitrogen are produced by the action of sulphuric acid upon niter contained in pots, which are placed between the sulphur-ovens and the chambers. The sulphur dioxide takes away part of the oxygen from the oxides of nitrogen, which are again oxidized by the air in the chambers. The sulphur trioxide produced unites with the steam to form sulphuric acid. The acid produced in the chamber, called chamber acid, which has a specific gravity of about 1.5 and contains 64 per cent. of H_2SO_4 , is concentrated in leaden vessels until it reaches a specific gravity of 1.7 and contains 78 per cent. of H_2SO_4 , when it is run into glass or sometimes into platinum vessels, where the concentration is continued. By concentrating sulphuric acid as far as possible and then cooling sufficiently, crystals of the true acid H_2SO_4 are obtained. The ordinary acid is a hydrate containing varying amounts of water. A form of sulphuric acid known as Northhausen acid, or fuming sulphuric acid, is prepared by heating iron protosulphate or green vitriol in closed vessels; it is a solution of variable quantities of sulphur trioxide in sulphuric acid, or it may be regarded as pyrosulphuric acid, $H_2S_2O_7$. It is largely used in the manufacture of artificial alizarin.

Sulphuric acid is a strong dibasic acid, and forms both acid and neutral salts. It is found uncombined in natural waters of certain volcanic districts. Its salts are universally distributed in nature, and are most extensively used in the arts. The free acid is more widely used than any other, and is the agent for releasing other acids from their salts and preparing them in a pure state. See sulphate.—Sulphuric caustic, strong sulphuric acid made into a paste with plaster of Paris, saffron, or lint.—Sulphuric ether, $(C_2H_5)_2SO_4$, ethylic, vinic, or ordinary ether, a colorless mobile liquid, of a pleasant smell and pungent taste; specific gravity, 0.720. It is extremely volatile and highly inflammable; and its vapor, mixed with oxygen or atmospheric air, forms a very dangerous explosive mixture. It dissolves in ten parts of water, and is miscible with alcohol and the fatty and volatile oils in all proportions. It is employed in medicine as a stimulant and antispasmodic. The vapor of the ether when inhaled has at first an exhilarating intoxicating effect, which is soon followed by partial or complete insensibility. It is largely used as an anesthetic in surgical operations, either alone or mixed with chloroform. It is prepared by distilling a mixture of alcohol and sulphuric acid; hence the name sulphuric ether, although sulphuric acid does not enter into its composition. True sulphuric ether, also known as ethyl sulphate, $(C_2H_5)_2SO_4$, is an oily liquid, of burning taste and ethereal odor, resembling that of peppermint, of specific gravity 1.120, and may be distilled without decomposition under diminished pressure at a temperature of about 406° F.—Sulphuric oxide, or sulphur trioxide, SO_3 , a white crystalline body produced by the oxidation of sulphurous oxide (which see, under sulphurous). When this oxide is thrown into water, it combines rapidly with it to form sulphuric acid.

sulphurine (sul-fū-rin), a. [< sulphur + -ine.] Pertaining to or resembling sulphur; sulphureous. Bailey. [Rare.]

sulphuring (sul-fū-īng), n. [Verbal n. of sulphur, v.]

1. The act or process of exposing to fumes of burning sulphur or of sulphuric acid.—2. The process of converting a part of the oxygen of the air in a wine-cask into sulphurous acid, by introducing, just before the wine is racked into the cask, a burning rag impregnated with sulphur. It serves to hinder acetous fermentation.—3. The act or process of applying flowers of sulphur, as to vines or roses to combat or prevent mildew.

sulphurization, sulphurisation (sul-fū-ri-zā'-shon), n. [< sulphurize + -ation.] Same as sulphuration, 2.

The higher the temperature employed, the lower is the degree of sulphurization of the products.

W. H. Greenwood, Steel and Iron, p. 50.

sulphurize (sul-fū-riz), v. t.; pret. and pp. sulphurized, pp. sulphurizing. [< sulphur + -ize.] To sulphurate. Also spelled sulphurise.

Large commercial packages, as bales of goods and the like, cannot efficiently be sulphurized without loosening their covers and spreading out the contents.

Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 205.

sulphur-ore (sul-fēr-ōr), n. The commercial name of iron pyrites, from the fact that sulphur and sulphuric acid are obtained from it.

sulphurous (sul-fū-rus), a. [< F. sulfureux = Pr. solfros = Sp. sulfuroso, < L. sulfurosus, sulphurosus, full of sulphur, < sulfur, sulphur; see sulphur.] Full of or impregnated with sulphur; containing sulphur; of or pertaining to sulphur; like sulphur; like the suffocating fumes or the heat of burning sulphur.

There's hell, there's darkness, there's the sulphurous pit!

Shak., Leary, iv. 6, 130.

She has a sulphurous spirit, and will take

Light at a spark. B. Jonson, Catiline, iii. 3.

Wee once more sail'd under the Equator, . . . the wind . . . veering into E. N. E., so that the Monsoon affronted us, . . . at which time many of your company died, imputing the cause of their Calentures, Fluxes, Aches, . . . and the like to the sulphurous heat there.

Sir T. Herbert, Travels (ed. 1638), p. 30.

And the sulphurous rifts of passion and we Lie deep 'neath a silence pure & smooth.

Lowell, Vision of Sir Launfal, i, 1, 161.

Sulphurous oxide, SO_2 , a gas formed by the combustion of sulphur in air or dry oxygen. It is transparent and colorless, of a disagreeable taste, a pungent and suffocating odor, is fatal to life, and very injurious to vegetation. By the aid of pressure and cold it may be reduced to the liquid state. It extinguishes flame, and is not itself inflammable. It has bleaching properties, so that the fumes of burning sulphur are often used to whiten straw, and silk and cotton goods. It is also used as an antiseptic. This gas is also called sulphur dioxide; when led into water it forms sulphurous acid, H_2SO_3 . This acid readily takes up oxygen, passing into sulphuric acid; it is dibasic, forming salts called sulphites. Sulphurous-acid gas is called in the trade vapor of burning brimstone.

sulphur-rain (sul-fēr-rān), n. See rain, 2 (a).

sulphur-root (sul-fēr-rōt), n. Same as sulphurwort.

sulphur-salt (sul-fēr-sālt), n. Same as sulphosalt.

sulphur-spring (sul-fēr-spring), n. A spring containing sulphurous compounds, or impregnated with sulphurous gases. Such springs are common in regions of dying-out or dormant volcanism. See spring.

sulphur-waters (sul-fēr-wā'tēr), n. pl. Waters impregnated with sulphureted hydrogen.

sulphurweed (sul-fēr-wēd), n. Same as sulphurwort.

sulphur-whale (sul-fēr-hwāl), n. Same as sulphur-bottom.

sulphurwort (sul-fēr-wērt), n. An Old World umbelliferous herb, Paeudanthum officinale, with large umbels of pale-yellow flowers. The root has a yellow resinous juice, and an odor comparable to that of sulphur. It contains pectenanthin, and was formerly used in medicine; it is still somewhat used in veterinary practice. Also sulphureweed and sulphur-root.

sulphury (sul-fēr-i), a. [< sulphur + -y.] 1. Sulphurous.

Sulphury wrath

2. In entom., tinged with sulphur-yellow: as, sulphury white.

sulphury-yellow (sul-fēr-yel ō), n. The yellow color of sulphur; a pale or light yellow. See sulphur, a.

sulphuryl (sul-fū-ri), n. The bivalent radical SO_2 .

sulphydrate (sul-fū'hrāt), n. Same as sulphohydrate.—Methyl sulphydrate. Same as methyl mercaptan (which see, under mercaptan).

sulphydic (sul-fū'hrīk), a. [< sulph(ur) + hydr(o)gen + -ic.] Same as sulphureted.

Sulpician, Sulpitian (sul-pish'ian), n. [< F. Sulpicien, the parish of St. Sulpice in Paris, where they were first organized; < L. Sulpicius, a Roman name.] One of a Roman Catholic order of priests established at Paris by the Abbé Olier, about 1645, for the purpose of training young men for the clerical office.

sultan (sul-tān), n. [A later form, after the mod. F. or It. or the orig. Ar. of early mod. E. sultan, soldān, soudān, < ME. solthan, soudan, soudan, swedon, sawdon, < OF. soldān, soudan, sultan, F. sultan = Pr. sultan = Sp. soldan, sultan = Pg. soldāo, soldāo = It. sultano = *D. 2. In ornith., a purple or hyacinthine gallinule, or porphyrio; a bird of either of the genera Porphyrio and Imoria, belonging to the rail family, Rallidae; so called from their gorgeous coloration. The American sultan is Imoria martinica. See the generic names, and gallinule. Also called sultana.—3. An ornamental variety of the domestic hen, of small size and pure-white plumage, and having the head heavily crested and bearded, beak white, legs blue, shanks feathered, and toes five.

A small white-crested variety, profusely feathered on the legs, was received some twenty years since (1864) from Turkey; they are now known as Sultans.

Encyc. Brit., XIX. 645.

4. Either of two garden-flowers, Centauria moschata, the sweet sultan, with purple or white flowers, and C. suaroides, the yellow sultan; both often classed as Ambrhos. They are desirable old annuals, both, especially the former, sweet-scented. They are also called respectively purple (or white) sweet-sultan and yellow sweet-sultan.—Sultan coffee. See coffee.—Sultan's parasol. See Sterculia.

sultana (sul-tā'nā), n. [< It. sultana (= Sp. Pg. sultana = F. sultane), *< ML. sultana, fem. of sultanus, sultan; see sultan.] 1. The mother, a wife, or a daughter of a sultan.—2. A mistress, especially of a king or prince.

sultrily (sul-tri-lī), adv. In a sultry manner; oppressively. Browning, Serenade at the Villa.

sultriness (sul-tri-nes), n. The state of being sultry; heat with a moist or close air.

sultry (sul-trī), a. [Contr. of sultry, q. v.] 1. Giving forth great or oppressive heat.

Such as, born beneath the burning sky

And sultry sun, betwixt the tropics lie.

Dryden, Æneid, vii. 309.

2. Very hot and moist; heated, close, stagnant, and heavy; as, a sultry atmosphere; a sultry night.

April passes and May steals by;

June leads in the sultry July.

Bryant, The Song Sparrow.

3. Associated with oppressive heat.

What time the gray-dy winds her sultry horn.

Milton, Lycidas, l. 28.

The reapers at their sultry toil.

Tennyson, Palace of Art.

sum¹ (sum), n. [Early mod. E. summe, sonme, < ME. summe, sonme, < OF. summe, F. sonme = Sp. suma = Pg. summa = It. somma = D. G. Sw. summa = Dan. sum, < L. summa, the highest part, the top, summit, the chief point, the main thing, the principal matter, the substance, completion, issue, perfection, the whole, the amount, sum, fem. (see para) of summus, highest, superl. of superus, superior, higher, < super, over, above; see super. Cf. supremum.] 1. The highest point: the top; summit; completion; full amount; total; maximum.

Thus have I told thee all my state, and brought My story to the sum of earthly bliss.

Milton, P. L., viii. 522.

2. The whole; the principal points or thoughts when viewed together; the substance.

And in this moon's eke castration
Of hyes rouke of hony fill, the summe
Whereof is this significacion.

Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. S.), p. 162.

That is the sum of all, Leonato.

Shak., Much Ado, i. 1. 147.

The summe of what I said was that a more free permission of writing at some times might be profitable.

Milton, Apology for Smectymnus.

3. The aggregate of two or more numbers, magnitudes, quantities, or particulars; the result of the process of addition: as, the sum of 5 and 7 is 12; the sum of a and b is a + b.

They semble in sortes, summae fulle huge,
Sowdanes and Sarezenes owt of scer laudes.

Morte Arthur (E. E. S.), l. 606.

You know how much the gross sum of deuce-ace amounts to.

Shak., L. L. L., i. 2. 49.

An Induction is not the mere sum of the Facts which are colligated. The Facts are not only brought together, but seen in a new point of view.

Whewell, Philos. of Induct. Sciences, l. xxix.

Public events had produced an immense sum of misery to private citizens.

Macauley, Macchiavelli.

Hence—4. The whole number or quantity.

The stretching of a span
Buckles in his sum of age.

Shak., As you Like it, iii. 2. 140.

5. A quantity of money or currency; an indefinite amount of money.

Than he got hom of florens a full fuere summe.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. S.), l. 12610.

I did send to you

For certain sums of gold, which you denied me.

Shak., J. C., iv. 3. 70.

6. An arithmetical problem to be solved, or an example of a rule to be worked out; also, such a problem worked out and the various steps shown.

His most judicious remarks differ from the remarks of a really philosophical historian as a sum correctly cast up by a book-keeper from a general expression discovered by an algebraist.

Macauley, History.

7. In the calculus of finite differences, a function the result of operating upon another function with the sign of summation, and expressing the addition of all successive values of that function in which the variable differs from unit to unit from zero or other constant value to one less than the value indicated; also, a special value of such a function. Thus, the sum of r^x is or, since the summation may commence at any other integral value of x , $\sum r^x = r^x(r-1) + C$, where C is an arbitrary constant or periodic function having for its period a submultiple of unity.—Algebraic sum. See algebraic.—A round sum, a good round sum. a large amount of money.

$$\sum r^x = 1 + r + r^2 + r^3 + \dots + r^x - 1 = \frac{r^{x+1} - 1}{r - 1};$$

Bethinke thee, Gresham, threescore thousand pounds,
A good round sum; let not the hope of gaine
Draw thee to losse.

Heywood, If you Know not Me (Works, ed. 1874, l. 252).

Gaussian sum. See Gaussian.—Geometrical sum, a sum of vectors; the vector whose origin is the origin of the first of the added vectors, and whose terminal is the terminal of the last of the added vectors when the terminal of each except the last is made the origin of the next.—In sum, in short; in brief.

In sum, she appears a saint of an extraordinary sort, in so religious a life as is seldom met with in villages nowadays.

Evlyn, Diary, October 26, 1685.

Logical sum, the aggregate of a number of propositions, or that which is true if any one of the aggregants is true, and false only if all are false; also, the aggregate of terms, or that which includes all that any one of the aggregants includes, and excludes only what all exclude.—Lump, penul, etc., sum. See the qualifying words.—Pyramidal sum, the sum of a number of quantities, A, B, C, D, \dots having the form $A + 3B + 6C + 10D + \dots$ —Triangu- lar sum, the sum of several quantities, A, B, C, D, \dots having the form $A + 2B + 3C + 4D + \dots$ sum¹ (sum), v.; pret. and pp. summed, pp. summing. [Early mod. E. also summe; < OF. summe = Sp. sumar = Pg. summar = It. sommare, < ML. summāre, sum up, charge, exact, < L. summa, sum; see *sum*¹, n.] 1. trans. 1. To combine into a total or sum, add together; ascertain the totality of: often followed by up.

You cast the event of war, my noble lord,
And summed the account of chance, before you said,
"Let us make head." Shak., 2 Hen. IV., i. 1. 167.

The sands that are vpon the shore to summe,
Or make the wither'd Floures grow fresh againe.

Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 559.

Sum up at night what thou hast done by day;
And in the morning, what thou hast to do.

G. Herbert, The Temple, The Church Porch.

2. To bring or collect into a small compass; condense in a few words; usually with up: as, to sum up evidence; to sum up arguments.

To sum up all the Rage of Fate
In the two things I dread and hate—May'st thou be false, and I be great.

Prior, To a Young Gentleman in Love.

Since by its fruit a tree is judged,
Show me thy fruit, the latest act of thine!
For in the last is summed the first and all.

Browning, Ring and Book, II. 178.

Faith in God, faith in man, faith in work—this is the short formula in which we may sum up the teaching of the founders of New England, a creed ample enough for this life and the next.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 229.

3†. In falconry, to have (the feathers) full grown and in full number.

With prosperous wing full summed.

Milton, P. R., l. 14.

Hence—4†. To supply with full clothing.

No more sense spoken, all things Goth and Vandal,
Till you be summed again, velvets and scarlets,
Anointed with gold lace.

Fletcher, Wit without Money, iii. 1.

5. In the calculus of finite differences, to find the general expression for the aggregate of: said of the result of adding successive values of a given function in each of which the variable is increased over the last by unity. See sum, n., 7.—To sum up evidence, to recapitulate to the jury the facts and circumstances which have been adduced in evidence in the case before the court, giving at the same time an exposition of the law where it appears necessary; said of the presiding judge on a jury trial, or of counsel arguing for his client at the close of the evidence. See summing-up, under summing.II. intrans. To make a recapitulation; offer a brief statement of the principal points or substance: usually with up.

The young lawyer sums up in the end.

W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 316.

sum², n. An obsolete spelling of *sum*¹.

-sum. See -some.

sumac, sumach (sū'mak), n. [Formerly also shumac, shumack, shumach; earlier sumak, sumake, sumaque; = D. smak = G. sumak, sumach = Sw. sumack = Dan. sumak, < OF. sumac, sumach, F. sumac, sonnace = Sp. sumaque = Pg. sumagre = It. sommace, < Ar. sumāq, sumac. Cf. F. sommail, < Ar. samāqil, sumac.] 1. One of numerous shrubs or small trees of the genus Rhus. See def. 2, and phrases below.—2. A product of the dried and ground leaves of certain shrubs or trees of the genus Rhus or of other genera, much used for tanning light-colored leathers and to some extent for dyeing. The leading source of this product is the tanners' or Sicilian sumac, Rhus Coriaria, of southern Europe, cultivated in Sicily and also in Tuscany. The Venetian sumac, smoke-tree, or wig-tree, R. Cotinus, is grown in Tyrol for the same purpose. (See smoke-tree and scotino.) In Spain various species supply a similar substance, and in Algeria the leaves of R. pentaphylla, five-leaved or Tezera sumac, are applied to the manufacture of morocco. In France a tree of another genus, Coriaria myrtifolia, myrtle-leaved sumac, furnishes a similar product. (See Coriaria.) In the United States, particularly in Virginia, the leaves of several wild sumacs are now gathered as tan-stock—namely, of the dwarf, the smooth, the stag-horn, and perhaps the Canadian sumac. These contain more tannin than the European, but, at least with careless gathering, they make an inferior leather.—Canadian sumac, a low straggling bush, Rhus Canadensis (R. aromatica), found from Canada southward. Its leaves when crushed are pleasantly scented; those of the western variety, triobata, unpleasantly. Also called fragrant sumac.—Chinese sumac. See Ailanthus.—Coral-sumac, the poisonwood, Rhus Metopium; so named from its scarlet berries. See poisonwood, l.—Curriers' sumac. See Coriaria.—Dwarf sumac, Rhus copallina, of the eastern half of the United States, in the north a shrub, southward a small tree. It has dark shining leaves, with the common petiole winged between the leaflets. It yields tanning material (see def. 2), and its drupes are used like those of the smooth sumac. Also called black or mountain sumac.—Jamaica sumac. Same as black or mountain sumac.—Laurel sumac, Rhus laurina, a large evergreen much-branched and very leafy shrub, exhalant an aromatic odor. This and R. integrifolia, forming dense smooth thickets along cliffs near the sea in the same region, and a few species elsewhere, have simple leaves.—Poison sumac. See poison-sumac.—Scarlet sumac, the smooth sumac, in allusion to its leaves in autumn.—Sicilian sumac. See def. 2.—Smooth sumac, a shrub, Rhus glabra, common in barren or rocky soil in the eastern half of the United States. The leaves are smooth, somewhat glaucous, whitened beneath. It bears a large panicle of small crimson drupes, which are pleasantly acid, and officially recognized as astringent and refrigerant. A strong decoction or diluted fluid extract forms an effective gargle. Also Pennsylvania, upland, or white sumac.—Stag-horn or stag's-horn sumac, a shrub or small tree, Rhus typhina, of eastern North America. It is a picturesque species with irregular branches (suggesting the name), abundant long pinnate leaves, and in autumn pyramidal panicles of velvety crimson drupes. Its branchlets and leafstalks are densely velvety-hairy. Its wood is satiny, yellow streaked with green, occasionally used for inlaying. Its fruit is of a similar quality with that of R. glabra, both sometimes called vinegar-tree. Its bark and foliage are sometimes used for tanning and dyeing.—Swamp-sumac. Same as poison-sumac.—Tanners' or tanning sumac, specifically, Rhus Coriaria, a tree resembling the stag-horn sumac. The curriers' sumac is also so called.—Varnish sumac, the Japan lacquer- or varnish-tree. See lacquer-tree.—Venetian, Venice, or Venus's sumac. See def. 2.—Virginian sumac, a foreign name of the stag-horn sumac.—West Indian sumac, a small tree, Bumelia comeladifolia of the Simarubaceae, resembling sumac.*

sumac-beetle (sū'mak-bē'tl), n. A chrysomelid beetle of the United States, Blepharidha rhois, Smooth Sumac (Rhus glabra).

Jumping Sumac-beetle (Blepharidha rhois).

a, egg; b, eggs-masses covered with excrement; c, larva; d, cocoon; e, pupa; f, beetle. (Lines show natural sizes of a, c (separate figure), e, f; other figures natural size.)

which, both as larva and adult, feeds upon the foliage of sumae. The larva covers itself with its own excrement, like certain others of its family. More fully called jumping sumac-beetle.

sumach, n. See sumac.

sumack, sumaki. Obsolete forms of sumac.

sumaget, n. See summaget.

sumatra (sō-mā'trā), n. [So called from the island of Sumatra.] A sudden squall occurring in the narrow sea between the Malay peninsula and the island of Sumatra.

sumbul-root (sum'bul-rōt), n. The root of Ferula Sumbul. See sumbul.

sum-calculus (sum'kal'kū-lus), n. That part of the calculus of finite differences which treats of summation.

Sumerian, Sumir, Sumirian (sū-mē'ri-an, sū'mir, sū-mir'i-an), n. See Accadian.

sumless (sum'les), a. [< sum + -less.] Not to be summed up or computed; of which the amount cannot be ascertained; incalculable; inestimable. Shak., II. v., i. 2. 165.

summage, n. [Also sunage; < OF. somme, somme, somme, somme, a load, burden, pack; see seam. Cf. summer, sumpter.] A toll for carriage on horseback; also, a horse-load.

summarily (sum'a-ri-li), adv. In a summary manner; briefly; concisely; in a narrow compass, or in few words; in a short way or method; without delay; promptly; without hesitation or formality.

summariness (sum'a-ri-nes), n. The character of being summary.

summarist (sum'a-rist), n. [< summar + -ist.] One who summarizes; a writer or compiler of a summary.

summarize (sum'a-riz), v. t.: pret. and pp. summarized, ppr. summarizing. [< summar + -ize.] To make a summary or abstract of; reduce to or express in a summary; state or represent briefly. Also spelled summarise.

The distinctive catch-words which summarize his doctrine. S. Lanier, The English Novel, p. 44.

summary (sum'a-ri), a. and n. [I. a. = F. sommaire = Sp. sumario = Pg. sumario = It. sommario, < L. summarius, of or pertaining to the sum or substance, summa, the main thing, the substance, the whole; see sum. II. n. = F. sommario = Sp. sumario = Pg. sumario = It. sommario, < L. summarius, an epitome, abstract, summary, neut. of summarius, adj.: see I. I. a. 1. Containing the sum or substance only; reduced to few words; short; brief; concise; compendious: as, a summary statement of arguments or objections.—2. Rapidly performed; quickly executed; effected by a short way or method; without hesitation, delay, or formality.

He cleared the table by the summary process of tilting everything upon it into the fireplace.

This, it must be confessed, is rather a summary mode of settling a question of constitutional right.

Summary conviction. See conviction.—Summary jurisdiction Act. See jurisdiction.—Summary proceedings, in law. See proceeding.—Syn. 1. Succinct, Condensed, etc. (see concise); synoptical, terse, pithy.—2. Prompt, rapid.

II. n.; pl. summaries (-riz). 1. An abridged or condensed statement or account; an abstract, abridgment, or compendium containing the sum or substance of a fuller statement.

And have the summary of all our griefs, When time shall serve, to show in articles. Shak., 2 Hen IV., iv. 1. 73.

There is one summary, or capital law, in which nature meets, subordinate to God.

2. In law, a short application to a court or judge, without the formality of a full proceeding. Wharton.—Syn. 1. Compendium, Abstract, etc. See abridgment.

summation (su-mā'shon), n. [= F. sommation, < ML. summatio (-n-), admonition, lit. 'a summing up.' < summare, sum up; see sum.] Addition; specifically, the process of finding the sum of a series, or the limit toward which the sum of an infinite series converges; any combination of particular quantities in a total.

Of this series no summation is possible to a finite intellect. De Quincey.

We must therefore suppose that in these ideational tracts, as well as elsewhere, activity may be awakened, in any particular locality, by the summation therein of a number of tensions, each incapable alone of provoking an actual discharge. W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 523.

Summation of series, in math. See series.—Summation of stimuli, the phenomenon of the production of mental effects by iterated stimuli which a single one would not produce.

summational (su-mā'shon-al), a. [< summation + -al.] Produced or expressed by summation or addition: in contradistinction to somewhat similar results produced by other operations.—Summational tone. See resultant tone, under resultant.—summative (sum'a-tiv), a. [< summation + -ive.] Additive; operating or acting by means of addition. [Rare.]

Inhibition, however, is not the destruction, but the storing-up, of energy: and is attended not by the discharge, but by the increased tension, of relatively large and strongly-acting motor cells, whose connections with each other are mainly summative. G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 235.

summer¹ (sum'er), n. and a. [Early mod. The central body of the solar system, around which the earth and other planets revolve, retained in their orbits by its attraction, and supplied with energy by its radiance. Its mean distance from the earth is a little less than 93 millions of miles, its horizontal parallax being s."80 ± 0."02. Its mean apparent diameter is 32' 04"; its real diameter 865,500 miles, 109½ times that of the earth. Its volume, or bulk, is therefore a little more than 1,300,000 times that of the earth. Its mass—that is, the quantity of matter in it—is 330,000 times as great as that of the earth, and is about 900 times as great as the united masses of all the planets. The force of gravity at the sun's surface is nearly 28 times as great as at the earth's surface. The sun's mean density (mass ÷ volume) is only one fourth that of the earth, or less than one and a half times that of water. By means of the spots its rotation can be determined. It is found that the sun's equator is inclined 7½° to the plane of the ecliptic, with its ascending node in (celestial) longitude 73° 40'. The period of rotation appears to vary systematically in different latitudes, being about 25 days at the equator, while in solar latitude 40° it is fully 27. Beyond 45° there are no spots by which the rate of rotation can be determined. The cause of this peculiar variation in the rate of the sun's surface motion is still unexplained, and presents one of the most important problems of solar research. The sun's visible surface is called the photosphere, and is made up of minute irregularly rounded "granules," intensely brilliant, and apparently floating in a darker medium. These are usually 400 or 500 miles in diameter, and so distributed in streaks and groups as to make the surface, seen with a low-power telescope, look much like rough drawing-paper. Near sun-spots, and sometimes elsewhere, the granules are often drawn out into long filaments. (See sun-spot.) In the neighborhood of the sun-spots, and to some extent upon all parts of the sun, faculae (bright streaks which are due to an unusual crowding together and upheaval of the granules of the photosphere) are found. They are especially conspicuous near the edge of the disk. At the time of a total eclipse certain scarlet cloud-like objects are usually observed projecting beyond the edge of the moon. These are the prominences or protuberances, which in 1868 were proved by the spectroscopic to consist mainly of hydrogen, always, however, mixed with at least one other unidentified gaseous element (provisionally named helium), and often interpenetrated with the vapors of magnesium, iron, and other metals. It was also immediately discovered by Janssen and Lockyer that these beautiful and vivacious objects can be observed at any time with the spectroscopic, and that they are only extensions from an envelop of incandescent gases which overlies the photosphere like a sheet of scarlet flame, and is known as the chromosphere. Its thickness is very irregular, but averages about 5,000 miles. The prominences are often from 50,000 to 100,000 miles in height, and occasionally exceed 200,000; they are less permanent than the spots, and their changes and motions are correspondingly swift. They are not confined to limited zones of the sun's surface: those of the greatest brilliance and activity are, however, usually connected with spots, or with the faculae which attend the spots. The corona—the most impressive feature of a total eclipse—is a great "glory" of irregular outline surrounding the sun, and composed of nebulous rays and streams which protrude from the solar surface, and extend sometimes to a distance of several millions of miles, especially in the plane of the sun's equator. The lower parts are intensely bright, but the other parts are faint and indefinite. Its real nature, as a true solar appendage and no mere optical or atmospheric phenomenon, has been abundantly demonstrated by both the spectroscopic and the camera. Its visual spectrum is characterized by a vivid bright line in the green the so-called 1474 line, first observed in 1869 and by the faintly visible lines of hydrogen. Since then many other lines have been brought out by photography in the violet and ultra-violet parts of the spectrum. This proves that the corona consists largely of some unidentified gaseous element (provisionally known as coronium), mingled to some extent with hydrogen and metallic vapors, and probably impregnated with meteoric dust. The fact that the corona is observable only during the few moments of a total solar eclipse makes its study slow and difficult. Huggins has attempted to overcome the difficulty by means of photography, and, though without an absolute success so far, the results are not wholly discouraging. The spectroscopic enables us to determine the presence in the sun of certain well-known terrestrial elements in the state of vapor. The solar spectrum is marked by numerous dark lines (known as Fraunhofer's lines), and between 1850 and 1860 their explanation was worked out as depending upon the selective absorption due to the transmission of the light from the photosphere through the overlying atmosphere of cooler gases and vapors. Kirchhoff was the first (in 1859) to identify many of the familiar elements whose vapors thus impress their signature upon the sunlight. According to the recent investigations of Rowland (not yet entirely completed), thirty-six of the chemical elements are already identified in the solar atmosphere, all of them metals, hydrogen excepted. Among them barium, calcium, carbon, chromium, cobalt, by hydrogen, iron, magnesium, manganese, nickel, silicon, sodium, titanium, and vanadium are either specially conspicuous or theoretically important. The fact that some of the most abundant and important of the terrestrial elements fail to show themselves is, of course, striking, and probably significant. (Chlorine, oxygen (probably), nitrogen, phosphorus, and sulphur are none of them apparent; it would, however, be illogical and unsafe to infer from their failure to manifest themselves that they are necessarily absent. A difference of opinion prevails as to the precise region of the solar atmosphere in which Fraunhofer's lines originate. Some hold that the absorption which produces them takes place almost entirely in a comparatively thin stratum known as the reversing-layer, just above the surface of the photosphere. Lockyer holds, on the other hand, that many of them originate at a high elevation, and even above the chromosphere. Photometric observations show that the brilliance of the solar surface far exceeds that of any artificial light: it is about 150 times as great as that of the lime-cylinder of the calcium-light, and from two to four times as great as that of the "crater" of the electric arc. It is to be noted that the brightness of the sun's disk falls off greatly near the edge, owing to the general absorption by the solar atmosphere. The solar constant is defined as the quantity of heat (in calories) received in a unit of time by an area of a square meter perpendicularly exposed to the sun's rays at the upper surface of the earth's atmosphere, when the earth is at its mean distance from the sun. This quantity can be determined, with some approach to accuracy (say within 10 or 15 per cent.), by observations with pyrheliometers and actinometers. The earliest determinations (by J. Herschel and Pouillet, in 1838) gave about 19 calories a minute; later and more elaborate observations give larger results. Langley's observations make it very probable that its value is not under 30. Assuming it, however, as 25, it appears that the amount of energy incident upon the earth's atmosphere in the sun's rays is nearly 24 continuous horse-power per square meter when the sun is vertical; at the sea-level this is reduced about one third by the atmospheric absorption. The total amount of energy radiated by the sun's surface defies conception; it is fully 100,000 continuous horse-power or more than 1,000,000 calories a minute for every square meter, and according to Ericsson more than 400 times as great as that radiated by a surface of molten iron. It would melt in one minute a shell of ice 50 feet thick incasing the photosphere; to supply an equal amount by combustion would require the hourly burning of a layer of the best anthracite more than 20 feet thick—more than a ton for every square foot of surface. As to the temperature of the sun, our knowledge is comparatively vague. We have no means of determining with accuracy from our present laboratory data the temperature the photosphere must have in order to enable it to emit heat at the known rate. Various (and high) authorities set it all the way from about 2,500° C. to several millions of degrees. Experiments with burning-glasses, however, and observations upon the penetrating power of the solar rays, demonstrate that the temperature of the photosphere is certainly higher than that of any known terrestrial source, even the electric arc itself. The only theory yet proposed concerning the maintenance of the sun's heat which meets the case at all is that of Helmholtz, who finds the explanation in a slow contraction of the solar globe. A yearly shrinkage of about 250 feet (or 300 feet, if we accept Langley's value of the solar constant) in the sun's diameter would make good the whole annual expenditure of radiant energy, and maintain the temperature unchanged. If this is the true explanation, it follows, of course, that in time—probably in about eight or ten millions of years—the solar heat will begin to wane, and will at last be exhausted. It should be noted also that certain other causes—such, for instance, as the fall of meteors on the sun—contribute something to its heat-supply; but all of them combined will account for not more than a small percentage of the whole. The view now generally accepted of the constitution of the sun accords with this theory of the solar heat. The sun is believed to be, in the main, a mass of intensely heated gas and vapor, powerfully compressed by its own gravity. The central part is entirely gaseous, because its temperature, being from physical necessity higher than that of the inclosing photosphere, is far above the so-called "critical point" for every known element; no solidification, no liquefaction even, can therefore occur in the solar depths. But near the outer surface radiation to space is nearly free, the temperature is lowered to a point below the "critical point" of certain substances, and under the powerful pressure due to solar gravity condensation of the vapors begins, and thus a sheet of incandescent cloud is formed, which constitutes the photosphere. The chromosphere consists of the permanent gases and uncondensed vapors which overlie the cloud-sheet, while the corona still remains in great degree a mystery, as regards both the substances which compose it and the forces which produce and arrange its streamers. sun-crest (sun'kres), n. A South African herb, Helipha pectinata.

The Sun (after Winlock)

An Eruptive Prominence.

sun-dance (sun'dāns), n. A barbarous religious ceremony practised in honor of the sun by certain tribes of the North American Indians, as the Sioux and Blackfeet. An essential feature is the self-torture of youths who are candidates for admission to the full standing of warriors; the candidates pass through the flesh of their breasts, and strain against the thongs, which have been attached to a pole, until released by the tearing of the flesh. Dancing, charging at sunrise upon a "sun-pole," etc., are other features.

Ordinarily each tribe or reservation has its own celebration of the sun-dance.

Sunday (sun'dā), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also Sunday; < ME. sunday, sundag, sunniday, sunnaday, sunnunday, sunnundei, sunnundei, < AS. sunnan dag = OS. sunnan dag = OFries. sunnandi, sunnandi, sunnendei = MD. sundag, D. zunday = MLG. sunnendach, sonndach = OHG. sunnunday, MHG. sonnendach, sonndag, G. sonntag = Icel. sunnudagr = Sw. Dan. søndag (the Scand. forms are borrowed from the Sw. Dan. simulating son, son, i. e. 'the Son,' Christ). Sunday, lit. 'Sun's day' (tr. L. dies solis): AS. sunnan, gen. of sunne, sun; dag, day; see sun and day]. I. n. The first day of the week; the Christian Sabbath; the Lord's Day. See Sabbath.

The name Sunday, or 'day of the sun,' belongs to the first day of the week on astrological grounds, and has long been so used, from far beyond the Christian era, and far outside of Christian countries. (See week.) The ordinary name of the day in Christian Greek and Latin and in the Romance languages is the Lord's Day (Greek kyriakē, Latin dominica, French dimanche, etc.), while the Germanic languages, including English, call it Sunday. In the calendar of the Roman Catholic and Anglican churches the Sundays of the year form two series — one reckoned from Christmas, and one from Easter. The first series consists of four Sundays in Advent, one or two Sundays after Christmas, and the Sundays after Epiphany, from one to six in number, according to the date of Septuagesima. The second series consists of the remaining Sundays of the year — namely, Septuagesima, Sexagesima, Quinquagesima, six Sundays in Lent, Easter Sunday, five Sundays after Easter, Sunday after Ascension, Pentecost or Whitsunday, and the Sundays after Pentecost (the first of which is Trinity Sunday), from twenty-three to twenty-eight in number, or the Sundays after Trinity (according to the usage of the Anglican Church), from twenty-two to twenty-seven in number, the last of these being always the Sunday next before Advent. On the Sundays after Pentecost or Trinity not provided with offices of their own are used the offices of the Sundays omitted after Epiphany. In the Greek Church the first Sunday of the ecclesiastical year is the Sunday of the Publican and Pharisee, which is that next before Septuagesima. Then follow the Sundays of the Prodigal Son, of Apocryphus, of Tyrophagus, the six Sundays of Lent, Easter, (called Pascha or Bright Sunday), the five Sundays after Easter (called of St. Thomas or Antipascha, of the Oldmen-hearers, of the Paralytic, of the Samaritan Woman or Mid-Pentecost, of the Blind Man), the Sunday after Ascension (called of the Three Hundred and Eighteen Fathers of Nicea), Pentecost, and All Saints' Sunday, answering to Trinity Sunday. The Sundays after Pentecost are numbered continuously till the Sunday of the Publican and Pharisee is again reached. They are mostly named after the evangelist from whom the gospel for the day is taken. They are called Sundays of St. Matthew from Pentecost till the Exaltation of the Cross (September 14th), when two Sundays are called Sunday before and after the Exaltation respectively. After this follow the Sundays of St. Luke. The Sundays corresponding to the third and fourth in Advent are the Sunday of the Holy Fathers and the Sunday before Christmas, and the Sundays next preceding and succeeding the Epiphany are called Sunday before and after the Lights. Some Sundays of St. Matthew, if omitted before the Exaltation, are transferred to the time after the Epiphany. The seventeenth or last Sunday of St. Matthew is called the Sunday of the Canaanitish Woman.

sunder-tree (sun'dér-trē), n. See sundari.

sundew (sun'dū), n. 1. A plant of the genus Diandra. The species are small bog-loving herbs with perennial root or rootstock, their leaves covered with glandular hairs secreting dewy drops. The European and North American plants have the leaves in radical tufts, and the flowers racemed on a simple scape which nods at the summit so that the flower of the day is always uppermost. The best-known of these is D. rotundifolia, the round-leaved sundew of both continents, having small white flowers. (See cut under Diandra.) D. filiformis, the thread-leaved sundew, is a beautiful plant of wet sands near the Atlantic coast of the United States. Its slender leaves are very long, and its flowers are purple, very numerous, half an inch wide. Also dew-plant.

2. Any plant of the order Dracaceae. Lindley.

— Sundew family, the Dracaceae.

sun-dial (sun'di'al), n. [Early mod. E. also sunne-diall; < *sun*¹ + dial.] An instrument for indicating the time of day by means of the position of a shadow on a dial or diagram. The shadow used is generally the edge of a gnomon, which edge must be parallel to the earth's axis, about which the sun revolves uniformly in consequence of the earth's diurnal rotation. If a series of imaginary planes through the edge (one in the meridian and the others inclined to one another by successive multiples of 15°) be cut by the plane of the dial, the intersecting lines will be in the positions of the hour-lines of the dial. The shadow of any given point upon the gnomon-edge will fall at different positions on the hour-line according to the declination of the sun, and this circumstance may be used to make the dial show mean instead of apparent time. But this is inconvenient, and seldom used. Portable sun-dials used often to be made so that their indications depended exclusively on the altitude of the sun; such dials require adjustment for the time of the year. See did. — To rectify a sun-dial. See rectify.

Face of horizontal dial, shadow pointing to one o'clock.

sun-dog (sun'dog), n. A mock sun, or parhelion.

sundoree (sun'dō-rē), n. [Also sundaree, scut-laree; Assamese.] A cyprinoid fish, Semiplatys maculiflatus, of Assam. It has a long dorsal fin with twenty-seven or twenty-eight rays.

sundown (sun'down), n. [*< sun*¹ + *down*².] 1. Sunset; sunsetting.

Sitting there birling . . . till sun-down, and then coming home and crying for ale! Scott, Old Mortality, v.

2. A hat with a wide brim intended to protect the eyes. [U. S.]

Young faces of those days seemed as sweet and winning under wide-brimmed sundowns or old-time "pokes" as ever did those that have laughed beneath a "love of a bonnet" of a more de rigneur mode.

The Century, XXXVI, 769.

sundowner (sun'dou nēr), n. A man who makes a practice of arriving at some station at sundown, receiving rations for that night, and the next morning, when he is expected to work out the value of the rations, vanishing or pretending to be ill. [Slang, Australia.]

The only people [in Australia] who let themselves afford to have no specific object in life are the sundowners, as they are colloquially called — the loafers who saunter from station to station in the interior, secure of a nightly ration and a bunk.

Arch. Forbes, Souvenirs of some Continents, p. 74.

sundra-tree (sun'drā-trē), n. See sundari.

sun-dried (sun'drid), adv. Dried in the rays of the sun.

sundries (sun'driz), n. pl. Various small things, or miscellaneous matters, too minute or numerous to be individually specified; a comprehensive term used for brevity, especially in accounts.

having a long and sometimes spotted but mostly black opercular flap. They are known by many local names, as bream, pumpkin-seed, pumpkin-perch, coppernose, tobacco-box, sun-perch, and sunny. They are among the most abundant of the fresh-water fishes of the United States east of the Rocky Mountain region, and about 25 species are known. In the breeding-season they consort in pairs, and prepare a nest by clearing a rounded area, generally near the banks, and watch over the eggs until they are hatched.

2. A jellyfish, especially one of the larger kinds, a foot or so in diameter. See cut under Cyanea.

sunfish (sun'fish), r. i. [< sunfish, n.] To act like a sunfish, specifically as in the quotation.

Sometimes he [the bronco] is a "plunging" buckner, who runs forward all the time while bucking; or he may buck steadily in one place, or sunfish — that is, bring first one shoulder down almost to the ground and then the other.

T. Roosevelt, The Century, XXXV, 834.

sunflower (sun'flō ūr), n. 1. A plant of the genus Helianthus, so named from its showy golden radiate heads. The common or annual sunflower is H. annuus, a native of the western United States, much planted elsewhere for ornament, and for its oily seeds, which are valued as food for poultry and as a remedy for heaves in horses. (See also sunflower-oil, below.) It is naturally robust; but in cultivation it grows to a height of 10 or 12 feet; the disk of the head broadens from an inch or so to several inches, the leaves becoming more heart-shaped and often over a foot long. A favorite pro-

As after sunset gleth in the west.

Shak., Sonnets, lxxiii.

The normal sunset consists chiefly of a series of bands of colour parallel to the horizon in the west—in the order, from below upwards, red, orange, yellow, green, blue, together with a purplish glow in the east over the earth's shadow, called the "counter-glow." Nature, XXXIX, 346.

Hence—2. Figuratively, the close or decline.

'Tis the sunset of life gives me mystical lore.

Campbell, Lochiel's Warning.

3. The region or quarter where the sun sets; the west. Compare sunrising, 2.

sunset-shell (sun'set-shell), n. A bivalve mollusk of the genus Panopæus; so called from the radiation of the color-marks of the shell, suggesting the rays of the setting sun. P. res- perian, whose specific designation reflects the English

Sunset-shell, Panopæus resperian.

f, f', f'', f''', fan-hill siphon; g, anal siphon.

name, and P. ferreus are good examples. The genus is one of several leading forms of the family Tellinidae (sometimes giving name to a family Panopæidae). The shell is sinuaplate, and more or less truncate posteriorly; the animal has very long separate siphons and a stout foot. Also called setting-sun (which see).

sunsetting (sun'set-ing), n. [< ME. sunne set- tynge; < *sun*¹ + setting.] Sunset.

Sunne settyng, . . . Occasus. Prompt. Parv., p. 484.

sunshade (sun'shād), n. [< *sun*¹ + shade. Cf. AS. sunscadu, a shadow cast by the sun.] Something used as a protection from the rays of the sun. Specifically—(a) A parasol; in particular, a form, fashionable about 1850 and later, the handle of which was hinged so that the opened top could be held in a vertical position between the face and the sun.

Forth . . . from the portal of the old house stepped Phoebe, putting up her small green sunshade.

Hawthorne, Seven Gables, xi.

(b) A hood or front-piece made of silk shirred upon whale-bones, worn over the front of a bonnet as a protection from sun or wind. Such hoods were in fashion about 1850. Compare ugly, n.

I . . . asked her . . . to buy me a railway wrapper and a sunshade, commonly called an ugly.

Jean Ingelow, Off the Skelligs, viii.

(c) A kind of awning projecting from the top of a shop-window. (d) A dark or colored glass used upon a sextant or telescope to diminish the intensity of the light in observing the sun. (e) A tube projecting beyond the objective of a telescope to cut off strong light. (f) A shade-hat. [Rare.]

sunshine (sun'shîn), n. and a. [< ME. sunne- schine*, sunneschîn (cf. AS. sunscin, a mirror, speculum) = MD. sonneschijn, D. zonneshijn = G. sonnenschein (cf. Icel. sólskin, Sw. solsken, Dan. solskin); < *sun*¹ + shîn, n.] 1. n. 1. The light of the sun, or the space on which it shines; the direct rays of the sun, or the place where they fall.

It milt at the sunne shine.

Genesis and Exodus (E. E. T. S.), I. 3357.

Ne'er yet did I behold so glorious Weather

As this Sunshine and Rain together.

Cadley, The Mistress Weeping.

2. Figuratively, the state of being cheered by an influence acting like the rays of the sun; anything having a genial or beneficial influence; brightness; cheerfulness.

That man that sits within a monarch's heart,

And ripens in the sunshine of his favour,

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 2. 12.

A sketch of my character, all written by that pen which had the power of turning every thing into sunshine and joy.

Lady Holland, Sydney Smith, viii.

To be in the sunshine, to have taken too much drink; to be drunk. George Eliot, Janet's Repentance, i. (Darics) [Slang.]

II. a. 1. Sunny; sunshiny; hence, prosper- ous; untroubled.

Send him many years of sunshine days!

Shak., Rich. II., iv. 1. 221.

2. Of or pertaining to the sunshine; of a fair- weather sort. [Rare.]

Summon thy sunshine bravery back,

O wretched spirit!

Whittier, My Soul and I.

Sunna (Crotalaria juncea).

sunshine-recorder (sun'shīn-rē-kōr dēr), n. An instrument for registering the duration of sunshine. Two principal forms have come into use, one utilizing the heating effect, the other the actinic effect, of the sun's rays. The Campbell sunshine-recorder consists of a glass sphere which acts as a lens, with its focus on a curved strip of millboard. The sun's rays, focused by the sphere, burn a path on the millboard as the sun moves through the heavens. The length of the burnt line indicates the duration of sunshine, or, more strictly, the length of time that the sun shines with sufficient intensity to burn the millboard. The photographic sunshine-recorder consists of a dark chamber into which a ray of light is admitted through a pinhole. This ray falls on a strip of sensitized paper which is placed on the inside of a cylinder whose axis is perpendicular to the sun's rays. Under the diurnal motion of the sun, the ray travels across the paper, and leaves a sharp straight line of chemical action, while another part of the paper is exposed to light. The axis of the cylinder has an adjustment for latitude. In the latest form of the apparatus two cylinders are used, one for the morning and the other for the afternoon trace.

sunshining† (sun'shī ning), a. Sunshiny. [Rare.]

As it fell out on a sun-shining day,
When Phoebus was in his prime.

Robin Hood and the Bishop (Child's Ballads, V. 28).

sunshiny (sun'shī nī), a. [< saunshine + -y.]

1. Bright with the rays of the sun; having the sky unclouded in the daytime; as, sunshiny weather.

We have had nothing but sunshiny days, and daily walks from eight to twenty miles a day. Lamb, To Coleridge.

2. Bright like the sun.

The fruitfull-headed beast, amazed
At flashing beames of that sunshiny shield,
Became stark blind, and all his senses dazl,
That downe he tumbled. Spenser, F. Q., I. viii. 20.

3. Bright; cheerful; cheery.

Perhaps his solitary and pleasant labour among fruits and flowers had taught him a more sunshiny creed than those whose work is among the tares of fallen humanity. R. L. Stevenson, An Old Scotch Gardener.

sun-smitten (sun'smīt n), p. a. Smitten or lighted by the rays of the sun. [Rare.]

I climb'd the roofs at break of day;
Sun-smitten Alps before me lay.

Tennyson, The Daisy.

sun-snake (sun'snāk), n. A figure resembling the letter S, or an S-curve, broken by a circle or other small figure in the middle: it is common as an ornament in the early art of northern Europe, and is supposed to have had a sacred significance.

sun-southing (sun'sou tūing), n. The transit of the center of the sun over the meridian at apparent noon.

sun-spot (sun'spōt), n. One of the dark patches, from 1,000 to 100,000 miles in diameter, which are often visible upon the photosphere. The central part, or umbra, appears nearly black, though the darkness is really only relative to the intense surrounding brightness. With proper appliances the umbra itself is seen to contain still darker circular holes, and to be overlaid by filus of transparent cloud. It is ordinarily surrounded by a nearly concentric penumbra composed of converging filaments. Often, however, the penumbra is unsymmetrical with respect to the umbra, and sometimes it is entirely wanting. The spots often appear in groups, and frequently a large one breaks up into smaller ones. They are continually changing in form and dimensions, and sometimes have a distinct drift upon the sun's sur-connected with descending currents from the upper regions of the solar atmosphere. The spots are limited to the region within 45° of the sun's equator, and are most numerous in latitudes from 15° to 20°, being rather scarce on the equator itself. They exhibit a marked periodicity in number: at intervals of about eleven years they are abundant, while at intermediate times they almost vanish. The explanation of this periodicity is still unknown. Numerous attempts have been made to correlate it with various periodic phenomena upon the earth—without doubtful success, however, except that there is an unmistakable (though unexplained) connection between the spottedness of the sun's surface and the number and violence of our so-called magnetic storms and auroras.

sun-spurge (sun'spūrg), n. See spurge 2.

sun-squall (sun'skwāl), n. A sea-nettle or jellyfish. One of the common species so called by New England fishermen is Aurelia flavidula.

sun-star (sun'stār), n. A starfish of many rays, as the British Crossaster papposus. See Heliaster, and cuts under Brisinga and Solaster.

sunstead (sun'sted), n. [Early mod. E. also sunnestead, sunsted.] A solstice. Colgrave. [Obsolete or archaic.]

The summer-sunstead falleth out alwaies (in Italie) to be just upon the foure and twentie day of June.

Bolland, tr. of Pliny, xviii. 28.

sunstone (sun'stōn), n. [< sun + stone.] A variety either of oligoclase or of orthoclase, or when green a microcline feldspar, showing red or golden-yellow colored reflections produced by included minute crystals of mica, goëthite, or hematite. That which was originally brought from Aventura in Spain is a reddish-brown variety of quartz. Also called aventurin, heliotite. The name is also occasionally given to some kinds of cat's-eye.

sun-stricken (sun'strik'n), p. a. Stricken by the sun; affected by sunstroke.

Enoch's comrade, careless of himself, . . . fell Sun-stricken. Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

sunstroke (sun'strōk), n. Acute prostration from excessive heat of weather. Two forms may be distinguished—one of sudden collapse without pyrexia (heat-exhaustion), the other with very marked pyrexia (thermic fever; see fever). The same effects may be produced by heat which is not of solar origin.

sunstruck (sun'strūk), n. Overcome by the heat of the sun; affected with sunstroke.

sun(sunt), n. [Ar. (?)]. The wood of Acacia Arabica, of northern Africa and southwestern Asia. It is very durable if water-seasoned, and much used for wheels, well-curbis, implements, etc.

sun-tree (sun'trō), n. The Japanese tree-of-the-sun. See Retinospora.

sun-trout (sun'trōut), n. The squeteague, a scianoid fish, Cynoscion regalis.

sun-try (sun'tri), v. t. To try out, as oil, or try out oil from, as fish, by means of the sun's heat. Sharks' livers are often sun-tryed. [Nautical.]

sun-up (sun'up), n. [< sun + up. Cf. sundown.] Sunrise. [Local, U. S.]

Such a horse as that might get over a good deal of ground atwixt sun-up and sun-down.

J. F. Cooper, Last of Mohicans, iv.

On dat day ole Erer Tarrypin, en his ole 'oman, en his th'ee chilluns, dey got up 'fo' sun-up.

J. C. Harris, Uncle Remus, xviii.

sun-wake (sun'wāk), n. The rays of the setting sun reflected on the water. According to sailors' tradition, a narrow wake is an indication of good weather on the following day, a broad wake a sign of bad weather.

sunward, sunwards (sun'wārd, -wārdz), a. and adv. [< sun + ward.] To or toward the sun. Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, ii. 6.

Which, launched upon its sunward track,

No voice on earth could summon back.

T. B. Read, Wagoner of the Alleghanies, p. 17.

sun-wheel (sun'hwēl), n. A character of wheel-like form, supposed to symbolize the sun: it has many varieties, among others the wheel-cross, and exhibits four, five, or more arms or spokes radiating from a circle, every arm terminating in a crescent.

sunwise (sun'wīz), adv. [< sun + -wise.] In the direction of the sun's apparent motion; in the direction of the movement of the hands of a watch.

sun-worship (sun'wēr'ship), n. The worship or adoration of the sun as the symbol of the deity, as the most glorious object in nature, or as the source of light and heat: heliolatry. See fire-worship.

Sun-worship is by no means universal among the lower races of mankind, but manifests itself in the upper levels of savage religion in districts far and wide over the earth, often assuming the prominence which it keeps and develops in the faiths of the barbaric world.

E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, II. 259.

sun-worshiper (sun'wēr'ship-ēr), n. A worshiper of the sun: a fire-worshiper.

sun-year (sun'yēr), n. A solar year.

sun-yellow (sun'yel'ō), n. A coal-tar color; same as maize, 3.

sup (sup), v. i.; pret. and pp. supped, ppr. supping. [Also dial. soup (pron. soup), sop; < ME. soupen (pret. soupp), < AS. sūpan (pret. scāp, pp. sopa) = MD. suppen, D. zuipen = MLG. sūpen, Lti. supen = OHG. sūfan, MllG. sūfen, G. saufen = Icel. sāpa = Sw. sāpa, sup; Teut. √ sup, sup, sip. Crashaw, Steps to the Temple, Ps. xxiii.

2. To eat with a spoon. [Scotch.]—3†. To treat with supper; give a supper to; furnish supper for.

Sup them well, and look unto them all.

Shak., T. of the S., Ind., i. 28.

Having caught more fish than will sup myself and my friend, I will bestow this upon you.

I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 78.

II. intrans. 1. To eat the evening meal; take supper; in the Bible, to take the principal meal of the day (a late dinner).

When they had supped, they brought Tobias in.

Tobit viii. 1.

Where supps he to-night? Shak., T. and C., iii. 1. 89.

The Sessions ended, I din'd, or rather supp'd (so late it was), with the Judges. Evelyn, Diary, July 18, 1679.

2. To take in liquid with the lips; sip.

Whenne your potage to yow shall be broughte,

Take yow sponys, and suupe by no way.

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 6.

Nor, therefore, could we sup or swallow without it [the tongue].

N. Gree, Cosmologia Sacra, i. 5.

3. To eat with a spoon. [Scotch.]

sup (sup), n. [< sup, v. Cf. sup, n., and sip, n.] A small mouthful, as of liquor or broth; a little taken with the lips; a sip.

Shew 'em a crust of bread,

They'll saint me presently; and skip like apes

For a sup of wine. Fletcher, Sea Voyage, iv. 2.

supawn (su-pān'), n. [Also suppaw, separn, sepon (also, in a D. spelling, separn); of Amer. Ind. origin, prob. connected with ponc, formerly paunc, Amer. Ind. appone: see ponc 1.] A dish consisting of Indian meal boiled in water, usually eaten with milk: often called mush. [U. S.]

Ev'n in thy native regions, how I blush

To hear the Pennsylvanians call these Mush!

On Hudson's banks while men of Belgic spawn

Insult and eat thee by the name Suppaw.

J. Barlow, Hasty Pudding, l.

They ate their supaw and rolliches of an evening, smoked their pipes in the chimney-mook, and upon the Lord's Day waddled their wonted way to the Gereformeerde Kerche.

E. L. Fyinner, Begum's Daughter, l.

supe (sūp), n. [An abbr. of super, I, for super-numerary.] 1. A supernumerary in a theater; a super. [Colloq.]—2. A toady; especially, one who toadies the professors. [College slang, U. S.]

supe (sūp), v. i.; pret. and pp. suped, ppr. suping. [< supe, n.] To act the supe, in either sense.

supellectile (sū-pe-lek'til), a. and n. [< L. supellex (supellectil), household utensils.] I. a. Pertaining to household furniture; hence, ornamental. [Rare.]

The heart of the Jews is empty of faith, . . . and garnished with a few broken traditions and ceremonies: supellectile complements instead of substantial graces.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, II. 37.

II. n. An article of household furniture; hence, an ornament. [Rare.]

The heart, then, being so accepted a vessel, keep it at home; having but one so precious supellectile or moveable, part not with it upon any terms.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 250.

super- [F. super, sur = Sp. Pg. super, sobre = It. super, sopra, < L. super, prefix, < super, prep., over, above, beyond, = Gr. ἐπέρ, over, above: see hyper. In ML and Rom. super is more confused with the related supra. In words of OF. origin it appears in E. as sur, as in surprise, surrender, surround, etc.] A prefix of Latin origin, meaning 'over, above, beyond': equivalent to hyper- of Greek origin, or over- of English origin. In use it has either (a) the meaning 'over' or 'above' in place or position, as in superstruc- face. They last from a few hours to many months. They are known to be shallow cavities in the photosphere, depressed several hundred miles below the general level, and owe their darkness mainly to the absorption of light due to the cooler vapors which fill them. Their cause and the precise theory of their formation are still uncertain, though it is more than probable that they are in some way ture, etc., or (b) the meaning 'over, above, beyond' in manner, degree, measure, or the like, as in superexcellent, superfine, etc. It is a common English formative, especially in technical use. In chemistry it is used similarly to per-. In zoology and anatomy it is used like hyper-, sometimes like epi-, is the opposite of sub-, subter-, and hypo-, and is the same as supra-. The more recent and technical compounds of super- which follow are left without further etymology.

super (sū'pēr), n. [Abbr. of the words indicated in the definitions.] 1. A supernumerary; specifically, a supernumerary actor.

My father was a man of extraordinary irritability, partly natural, partly induced by having to deal with such preternaturally stupid people as the lowest class of actors, the supers, are found to be.

Tales, Fifty Years of London Life, I. ii.

2. A superhive. See bar super, under bar-.—
3. A superintendent. [Colloq. in all uses.]

superable (sū'pēr-ā-bl), a. [L. superabilis, that may be surmounted, < superare, go over, rise above, surmount, < super, over; see super-.] Capable of being overcome or conquered; surmountable.

Antipathies are generally superable by a single effort.

Johnson, Rambler, No. 126.

superableness (sū'pēr-ā-bl-nes), n. The quality of being superable or surmountable. Bailey.

superably (sū'pēr-ā-bli), adv. So as to be superable.

superabound (sū'pēr-ā-bound'), v. i. [= F. surabonder = Pr. sobrondar = Sp. sobracabundar = Pg. sobracabundar, superabundare = It. soprabundare, < LL. superabundare, superabound, < L. super, above, + abundare, overflow, abound; see abund.] To abound above or beyond measure; be very abundant or exuberant; be more than sufficient.

In those cities where the gospel hath abounded, sin hath superabounded. Rev. T. Adams, Works, II. 271.

God has filled the world with beauty to overflowing—superabounding beauty. J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 183.

superabundance (sū'pēr-ā-bun'dāns), n. [= F. surabondance = Pr. sobracabundānsa = Sp. sobracabundancia = It. soprabundanza, < LL. superabundantia, superabundance, < L. superabundantia, superabundant, see superabundant.] The state of being superabundant, or more than enough; excessive abundance; excess.

Many things are found to be monstrous & prodigious in Nature; the effects whereof diuers attribute . . . either to defect or superabundance in Nature.

Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 462.

superabundant (sū'pēr-ā-bun'dant), a. [= F. surabundant = Sp. sobracabundante = Pg. sobracabundante, superabundante = It. soprabundante, < L. superabundantia, superabundant, see superabundant.] Abounding to excess; being more than is sufficient; redundant.

God gives not onely corne for need,
But likewise superabundant seed.

Herrick, To God.

superabundantly (sū'pēr-ā-bun'dant-li), adv. In a superabundant manner; more than sufficiently; redundantly.

Nothing but the uncreated infinite can adequately fill and superabundantly satisfy the desire. Cheyne.

superacidulated (sū'pēr-ā-sid'ū-lā-ted), a. Acidulated to excess.

superacromial (sū'pēr-ā-krō'mi-āl), a. Situated upon or above the acromion. Also supracromial.

superadd (sū'pēr-ad'), v. t. [L. superaddere, add over and above, < super, over, + addere, add; see add.] To add over and above; join in addition.

To the obligations of creation all the obligations of redemption and the new creation are superadded; and this threefold cord should not so easily be broken.

Baxter, Divine Life, I. 11.

The superadded circumstance which would evolve the genius had not yet come; the universe had not yet been created.

George Eliot, Middlemarch, x.

superaddition (sū'pēr-ā-dish'on), n. 1. The act of superadding, or the state of being superadded.

It is quite evident that the higher forms of life are the result of continued superaddition of one result of growth-force on another.

E. D. Cope, Origin of the Fittest, p. 397.

2. That which is super-added.

It was unlikely women should become virtuous by ornaments and superadditions of morality which did decline the laws and prescriptions of nature.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 38.

superadvenient (sū'pēr-ad-vē'nient), a. 1. Coming upon; coming to the increase or assistance of something.

The soul of man may have matter of triumph when he has done bravely by a superadvenient assistance of his God.

Dr. H. More.

2. Coming unexpectedly. [Rare.]

superagency (sū'pēr-ā'jēn-si), n. A higher or superior agency.

superaltar (sū'pēr-āl-tār), n. [L. super-altar, < L. super, over, + altare, altar.] A small slab of stone consecrated and laid upon or let into the top of an altar which has not been consecrated, or which has no stone mensa: often used as a portable altar. [The word is often incorrectly used of the altar-ledge or -ledges (gradines), also called the retable.]

superanal (sū'pēr-ā-nāl), a. In entom., same as supraanal.

superangelic (sū'pēr-an-jel'ik), a. More than angelic; superior in nature or rank to the angels; relating to or connected with a world or state of existence higher than that of the angels.

I am not prepared to say that a Superangelic being, continuing such, might not have entered into all our wants and feelings as truly as one of our race.

Chauncy, Perfect Life, p. 217.

superangular (sū'pēr-ang'gū-lār), a. Situated over or above the angular bone of the mandible: more frequently surangular (which see).

superannate (sū'pēr-an'āt), v. i. [L. superannatus, pp. of superannare (> F. surannier), live beyond the year, hence (in F.) grow very old, < L. super, over, + annus, a year; see annual.] To live beyond the year.

The dying in the winter of the roots of plants that are annual seemeth to be partly caused by the over-experience of the sap into stalk and leaves, which being prevented, they will superannate, if they stand warm.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 448.

superannuate (sū'pēr-an'ū-āt), v. pret. and pp. superannuated, pp. superannuating. [Altered, in apparent conformity with annual, from superannate, q. v.] 1. trans. 1. To impair or disqualify in any way by old age; used chiefly in the past participle: as, a superannuated magistrate.

Some superannuated Virgin that hath lost her Lover.

Howell, Letters, I. i. 12.

Were there any hopes to outlive vice, or a point to be superannuated from sin, it were worthy our knees to implore the days of Methuselah.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, I. 42.

A superannuated beauty still unmarried.

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xxviii.

2. To set aside or displace as too old; specifically, to allow to retire from service on a pension, on account of old age or infirmity; give a retiring pension to; put on the retired list: pension off: as, to superannuate a seaman.

History scientifically treated restores the ancient gift of prophecy, and with it may restore that ancient skill by which a new doctrine was furnished to each new period and the old doctrine could be superannuated without disrespect.

J. R. Seeley, Nat. Religion, p. 224.

II. † intrans. 1. To last beyond the year.—2. To become impaired or disabled by length of years; live until weakened or useless.

superannuate (sū'pēr-an'ū-āt), a. [Cf. superannate, v.] Superannuated; impaired or disabled through old age; lasting until useless.

Doubtless his church will be no hospital
For superannuate forms and mumping shams.

Lowell, Cathedral.

superannuation (sū'pēr-an'ū-ā'shon), n. [Cf. superannuate + -ion.] 1. The condition of being superannuated; disqualification on account of old age; of persons, senility; decrepitude.

Slyness blinking through the watery eye of superannuation.

Coleridge.

The world itself is in a state of superannuation, if there be such a word.

Cooper, To Joseph Hill, Feb. 15, 1781.

2. The state of being superannuated, or removed from office, employment, or the like, and receiving an allowance on account of long service or of old age or infirmity; also, a pension or allowance granted on such account. Also used attributively: as, a superannuation list.

In the first place superannuation is a guarantee of fidelity; in the second place, it encourages efficient officers; in the third place, it retains good men in the service.

Pap. Sci. Mo., XXVII. 573.

3. The state of having lived beyond the normal period.

The world is typified by the Wandering Jew. Its sorrow is a form of superannuation.

G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 201.

A monk he seemed by . . . the superannuation of his knowledge.

De Quincy, John Foster.

superaqueous (sū'pēr-ā'kwē-us), a. Situated or being above the water. [Rare.]

There has been no evidence to show that the uprights supported a superaqueous platform.

Jour. Anthropol. Inst., XV. 459.

superarrogant (sū'pēr-ar'ō-gant), a. Arrogant beyond measure.

The Pope challenge a faculty to cure spiritual impotencies, leprosy, and pestilence. Alas! it is not in his power, though in his pride and supercare and glory.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, II. 12.

superation (sū'pēr-ā'shon), n. [= F. superation, < L. superatio], an overrunning, < superare, pp. superatus, go over. 1. The apparent passing of one planet by another, in consequence of the more rapid movement in longitude of the latter.—2. The act or process of surmounting; an overcoming.

This superb and artistic superation of the difficulties of dancing in that unfriendly foot-gear.

Howells, Venetian Life, II.

superb (sū'pərb'), a. [= F. superba = Sp. soberbio = Pg. soberbo = It. superbo, < L. superbus, proud, haughty, domineering, < super, over; see super-.] [Cf. Gr. i-ēpōe, overweening, outrageous, < i-ēpō, over, + ia, strength, force.] 1. Proud; haughty; arrogant. Bailey, 1731.—2. Grand; lofty; magnificent; august; stately; splendid.

Where noble Westmoreland, his country's friend,
Bids British greatness love the silent shade,
Where pales superb, in classic elegance,
Arise, and all is Roman, like his heart.

C. Smart, The Hop-Garden, II.

He [Thoreau] gives us now and then superb outlooks from some jutting crag. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 208.

3. Rich; elegant; sumptuous; showy: as, superb furniture or decorations.

The last grave top of the last age,
In a superb and feather'd hearse.

Chorrell, The Ghost.

4. Very fine; first-rate: as, a superb exhibition. [Colloq.]—Superb bird of paradise, Lophorhina superba; so named by Latham, after the superbe of Brisson (1769).

Superb Bird of Paradise (Lophorhina superba), male.

It was placed in the genus Paradisea, till Vieillot founded for it the generic name under which it is now known, in the form Lophorhina (1816). The superb is confined to New Guinea. The male is 9 inches long; the general color is velvety-black, burnished and spangled with various metallic iridescence; the mantle rises into a sort of shield, and the breastplate is of rich metallic green plumes mostly edged with copper. The female is brown of various shades, as chocolate and rufous and blackish, varied with white in some places, and has the under parts mostly pale buff cross-banded with brown.—Superb lily, a plant of the genus Gloriosa, especially G. superba.—Superb warbler. See Maturus.—Syn. 2. Magnificent, splendid, etc. (see grandy, noble, beautiful, exquisite).

superbiater, v. t. [Cf. superb + -iater.] To make haughty.

By living under Pharaoh, how quickly Joseph learned the Courtship of an Oath! Italy builds a Villain; Spain superbiates; Germany makes a drunkard.

F. Rham, Resolves, I. 91.

superbioust, a. [*Cf. ML. superbhosus (in adv. superbhosus), < L. superbus, pride, < superbus, proud; see superb.] Proud; haughty.

For that addition, in some and superbhosus contempt annexed by you unto our public prayer.

Declaration of English Imposture (1603). (Nares.)

superbipartient (sū'pěr-bī-pār'ti-ent), a. [Cf. L. superbipartientis, < L. super, over, + bis, bi-, twice, + partire, v., pp. of partiri, divide; see part.] Exceeding by two thirds—that is, in the ratio to another number of 5 to 3.—Superbipartient double, a number which is to another number as 5 to 3.

superbiquintal (sū'pěr-bī-kwīn'tal), a. Related to another number as 7 to 5; exceeding by two fifths.

superbiterial (sū pēr-bī-tēr'shāl), a. Same as superbiterial.

superbly (sū-pēr-b'li), adv. In a superb manner. (a) Haughtily; contemptuously; as, he snubbed him superbly. (b) Richly; elegantly; magnificently; as, a book superbly bound.

superbness (sū-pēr-b'nes), n. The state of being superb; magnificence. Imp. Dict.

supercalendered (sū-pēr-kal'en-dērd), a. Noting paper of high polish that has received an unusual degree of rolling. Paper passed through the calendaring-rolls attached to the Fourdrinier machine is known as machine-calendered. When passed again through a stack of six or more calendaring-rolls, it is known as supercalendered.

supercallosal (sū-pēr-kal-lō'sāl), a. and n. I. a. In anat., lying above the corpus callosum; specifying a fissure or sulcus of the median aspect of the cerebrum, otherwise called the callosomarginal and splanial fissure or sulcus.

II. n. The supercallosal fissure or sulcus.

supercanopy (sū-pēr-kan'ō-pī), n. In ornamental constructions and representations, such as the shrine or the engraved brass, an upper arch, gable, or the like covering in one or more subordinate niches, arches, etc.

supercargo (sū-pēr-kār'gō), n. [Accom. < Sp. Fig. sobrecarga, a supercargo, < sobre, over, + carga, cargo; see carga.] A person in a merchant ship whose business is to manage the sales and superintend all the commercial concerns of the voyage.

supercargoship (sū-pēr-kār'gō-ship), n. [< supercargo + -ship.] The position or business of supercargo.

"I am averse," says this brother [of Washington Irving], in a letter dated Liverpool, March 9, 1869, "to any supercargoship, or anything that may bear you to distant or unfriendly climates."

Pierre M. Irving, Washington Irving, I. 107.

supercelstial (sū pēr-sē-sē'shāl), a. [< LL. supercaelestis, that is above heaven, < L. super, above, + caelum, heaven; see caelestial.] 1. Situated above the firmament or vault of heaven, or above all the heavens. The doctrine of supercaelestial regions belongs to Plato, who, in the "Phaedrus" (trans. by Jowett), says: "Now of the heaven which is above the heavens [Greek hyperouranos] no earthly poet has ever sung or will sing worthily; but I must tell, for I am bound to speak truly when speaking of the truth. The colorless and shapeless and intangible essence and only reality dwells encircled by true knowledge in this home, visible to the mind alone, who is the lord of the soul."

I dare not think that any supercelstial heaven, or whatsoever else, not himself, was increate and eternal.

Kaleigh.

2. More than celestial; having a nature higher than that of celestials; superangelic.

supereremonious (sū-pēr-ser-ē-mō'ni-us), a. Excessively ceremonious; too much given to ceremonies. Ep. Gauden, Tears of the Church, p. 625. (Davies.)

2. In her., to place as a supercharge.

supercharge (sū-pēr-chā'j), n. In her., a charge borne upon an ordinary or other charge; thus, three mullets charged upon a fesse or bend constitute a supercharge.

superchery (sū-pēr-chē'ri), n. [< OF. supercherie, F. supercherie = Sp. supercheria, < It. supercheria, oppression, injury, fraud, < superchio, excessive, also excess, < L. super, above; see super-.] Deceit; cheating; fraud. Bailey, 1731.

supercilia, n. Plural of supercilium.

superciliaris (sū-pēr-sil-i-ā'ris), n.; pl. superciliares (-rēz). [NL.: see superciliary.] The muscle of the brow which wrinkles the skin of the forehead vertically; the corrugator supercilii.

superciliary (sū-pēr-sil-i-ā'ri), a. [< NL. supercilialis, < L. supercilium, eyebrow, hence haughtiness, < super, over, + √ kal as in Gr. καλέω, hide, conceal, + -ary.] 1. Situated over the eyelid—that is, over or above the eye, as the eyebrow; superorbital; as, the superciliary ridges. —2. Of or pertaining to the supercilia or eyebrows; contained in or connected with the superciliary region; superorbital. See cut under Coluber. —3. Marked by the supercilia; having a conspicuous streak over the eye; as, a superciliary bird. Also supraciliary. — Superciliary arch, the arched superorbital border or ridge. — Superciliary muscle, the superciliaris. Also called corrugator supercilii. See cut under muscle. — Superciliary ridge. (a) A prominence over the eye gradually developed in man by the formation of the frontal sinuses, which causes this part of the bone to bulge out. It is absent in childhood, and varies much in different individuals. (b) The superorbital prominence of various animals, formed by the projection of the upper edge of the orbit itself, or of a separate superorbital ossicle. — Superciliary shield, in ornith., a prominent plate or shelf projecting over the eye, as of many birds of prey. — Superciliary woodpecker, Picus (or Colaptes or Zenaidura or Centurus or Melanerpes) superciliosus (or superciliatus or subciliaris or striatus) of Cuba, 11 inches long, with the sides of the head conspicuously striped, and the nape and belly crimson.

supercilious (sū-pēr-sil'i-us), a. [< L. superciliosus, haughty, arrogant, < supercilius, pride, arrogance; see supercilium.] 1. Lofty with pride; haughtily contemptuous; overbearing.

Age, which always brings one privilege, that of being insolent and supercilious without punishment.

Pitt, Speech in Reply to Walpole.

2. Manifesting haughtiness, or proceeding from it; overbearing; arrogant; as, a supercilious air; supercilious behavior.

The deadliest sin, I say, that same supercilious consciousness of no sin.

Carlyle. (Imp. Dict.)

= Syn. Disdainful, contemptuous, overweening, lordly, consequential. See arrogance.

superciliously (sū-pēr-sil'i-us-li), adv. In a supercilious manner; haughtily; with an air of contempt. Milman.

superciliousness (sū-pēr-sil'i-us-nes), n. The state or character of being supercilious; haughtiness; an overbearing temper or manner.

That, in case they prove fit to be declined, they may appear to have been rejected, not by our superciliousness or laziness, but (after a fair trial) by our experience.

Boyle, Works, III. 129.

= Syn. Pride, Presumption, etc. See arrogance.

supercilium (sū-pēr-sil'i-um), n.; pl. supercilia (-i). [< L. supercilium, eyebrow, fig. a nod, the will, hence pride, haughtiness, arrogance, < super, over, + cilium, eyelid; see cilium.] 1. The eyebrow. (a) The superciliary region, ridge, or arch, including the hairs which grow upon it; the brow-ridge and associate structures. (b) The hairs of the eyebrow collectively; the eyebrow of ordinary language, a conspicuous feature of the countenance of most persons; commonly in the plural, meaning the right and left eyebrows together. See second cut under eye.

2. In anc. arch., the upper member of a cornice; also, the small fillet on either side of the scotia of the Ionic base. —3. In cutom., an arched line of color partly surrounding an ocellus.

supercivilized (sū-pēr-siv'i-līz), a. Civilized to excess; over-civilized. Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 340.

superclass (sū-pēr-klās), n. A group embracing two or more classes, or a single class contrasting with such a combination. Thus, birds and reptiles are classes constituting a superclass, Saurapsida, contrasting with Mammalia, as a superclass represented by the mammals only, and with Ichthyopsida, a superclass including the several classes of fish-like vertebrates. Compare subphylum.

supercolumnar (sū-pēr-kō-lum'nār), a. Situated over a column or columns; of, pertaining to, or characterized by supercolumnation.

supercolumniation (sū-pēr-kō-lum-ni-ā'shōn), n. In arch., the placing of one order above another.

supercomprehension (sū-pēr-kom-prē-hen'shōn), n. Comprehension superior to what is common; superior comprehension.

Molina said, for instance, that God saw the future possible acts of man through His supercomprehension of human nature.

Mind, XII. 265.

superconception (sū-pēr-kon-sep'shōn), n. Same as superfotation.

As also in those superconceptions where one child was like the father, the other like the adulterer.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 17.

superconformity (sū-pēr-kon-fōr'mī-ti), n. Excessive conformity, as to ceremonial usages; over-compliance.

A pragmatick superconformity.

Ep. Gauden, Tears of the Church, p. 113. (Davies.)

superconscious (sū-pēr-kon'shūs), a. Unconscious; of too lofty a nature to be conscious.

superconsequence (sū-pēr-kon-sē-kwens), n. Remote consequence.

For, not attaining the deuterocopy and second intention of the words, they are fain to omit their superconscious powers, figures, or tropologies.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 3.

supercrescence (sū-pēr-kres'sens), n. [< ML. supercrescentia, overgrowth, redundancy, < supercre-scere (t-s), growing over; see supercre-scere.] That which grows upon another growing thing; a parasite. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 6. [Rare.]

supercrecent (sū-pēr-kres'sent), a. [< L. supercre-scere (t-s), ppr. of supercre-scere, grow up, grow over, excel, < super, above, + cre-scere, grow; see cre-scere.] Growing on some other growing thing. Imp. Dict. [Rare.]

supercretaceous (sū-pēr-krē-tā'shins), a. Same as supracretaceous.

supercritical (sū-pēr-krit'i-kal), a. Excessively critical; hypercritical. Ep. Gauden, Tears of the Church, p. 15. (Davies.)

supercurious (sū-pēr-kū'ri-us), a. Extremely or excessively curious or inquisitive. Evelyn, Acetaria, viii.

supercurve (sū-pēr-kērv), n. A two-dimensional continuum in five-dimensional space.

superdentate (sū-pēr-den'tāt), a. In ectaceans, having teeth only in the upper jaw; the opposite of subdentate. Deerkurst, 1834. [Rare.]

superdeterminate (sū-pēr-dē-tēr-mi-nāt), a. Subject to more conditions than can ordinarily be satisfied at once. — Superdeterminate relation. See relation.

superdominant (sū-pēr-dom'i-nant), n. In music, same as subdominant.

superembattled (sū-pēr-em-bat'ld), a. In her., embattled, or bent into battlements, on the upper side only; as, a fesse superembattled. In this case the notches or crenelles are usually cut down one third of the width of the fesse.

supereminence (sū-pēr-em'i-nens), n. [= Sp. Fig. supereminencia, < LL. supereminencia, < L. supereminere (t-s); see supereminent.] The state of being supereminent; eminence superior to what is common; distinguished eminence; as, the supereminence of Demosthenes as an orator. Milton, Reformation in Eng., ii.

supereminency (sū-pēr-em'i-nen-si), n. [As supereminence (see -cy).] Same as supereminence.

supereminent (sū-pēr-em'i-nent), a. [= F. suréminent = Sp. Fig. supereminente, < L. supereminere (t-s), ppr. of supereminere, rise above, overtop, < super, above, + eminere, stand out, project; see eminent.] 1. Surpassingly eminent; very lofty; particularly elevated.

Paria is the Region which possesses the supereminente or highest parts thereof [of the earth] ereste vnto heauen. Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, ed. [Alber, p. 90].)

The lofty Hills, and supereminent Mountains.

Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 4.

2. Eminent in a superior or in the highest degree; surpassing others in excellence, power, authority, and the like.

His supereminent glory and majesty before whom we stand.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 47.

supereminently (sū-pēr-em'i-nent-li), adv. In a supereminent manner; in a supreme degree of excellence, ability, etc. Milton, Free Commonwealth.

superendow (sū-pēr-en-dou'), r. t. To endow in an extraordinary degree. Donne, Sermons, v.

supererogant (sū-pēr-er'ō-gant), a. [< L. supererogatus (t-s), ppr. of supererogare; see supererogate.] Supererogatory. Stackhouse, Hist. Bible. (Latham.)

supererogate (sū-pēr-er'ō-gāt), r. t.; pret. and ppr. supererogated, ppr. supererogating. [< LL. supererogatus, ppr. of supererogare, pay out over and above, < L. super, above, + erogare, expend, pay out; see erogate.] To do more than duty requires; make up for some deficiency by extraordinary exertion.

Good my lord,

Let nine own creatures serve me; others will

In this work supererogate, and I Shall think their diligence a mockery.

Beau. and Fl. (2), Faithful Friends, iv. 4.

supererogation (sū-pēr-er'ō-gā'shōn), n. [= F. surérogation = Sp. supererogación = Pg. supererogação = It. supererogazione, < LL. supererogatio (n-s), a payment in addition, < supererogare, pay in addition; see supererogate.] The act of one who supererogates; performance of more than duty requires.

It would be a work of supererogation for us to say one word in favor of military statistics as a means of illustrating the condition of an army.

Dr. J. Browne, Spare Hours, 3d ser., p. 167.

Works of supererogation, in Rom. Cath. theol., works done beyond what God requires, and constituting a reserved store of merit from which the church may draw to dispense to those whose service is defective.

supererogative (sū-pēr-er'ō-gā-tiv), a. [< supererogate + -ive.] Supererogatory. [Rare.]

O new and never-heard-of Supererogative height of wisdom and charity in our Liturgy!

Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst.

supererogatory (sū-pēr-er'ō-gā-tō-rī), a. [= F. surérogatoire = Sp. supererogatorio, < ML. supererogatorius, < LL. supererogare, pay in addition; as supererogate + -ary.] Partaking of supererogation; performed to an extent not enjoined or not required by duty; unnecessary; superfluous.

The declamations of philosophy are generally rather exhausted on supererogatory duties than on such as are indispensably necessary.

Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 3.

superessential (sū'pér-é-sen'shál), a. Super-substantial; of a nature which transcends mere being and essence: applied to the One by the Platonic philosophers, especially Proclus.

superethical (sū'pér-eth'i-kál), a. Transcending the ordinary rules of ethics; more than ethical.

Moral theology contains a superethical doctrine, as some grave divines have ridiculously called it.

Bolingbroke, Authority in Matters of Religion, § 6.

She was superexalted by an honour greater than the world yet ever saw. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 31.

superexaltation (sū'pér-eks-ál-tá'shón), n. Elevation above the common degree. Holyday.

superexceed (sū'pér-ek-séd'), v. t. [LL. superexcedere, exceed, < super, above, + excedere, exceed: see exceed.] To exceed greatly; surpass in large measure. [Rare.]

This great Nature Natantur . . .

Which All things Holds, Fills All, doth All Embrace, Super-exceeds, Sustains; and in One Place.

Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 78.

superexcellence (sū'pér-ek'se-lens), n. [< superexcellere (t) + -ce.] Superior excellence.

superexcellent (sū'pér-ek'se-lent), a. [< LL. superexcellens (t)-s, very excellent, < super, above, + excellens (t)-s, excellent: see excellent.] Excellent in an uncommon or superior degree; very excellent.

One is Three, not in the confusion of Substance, but unity of Person; and this is the first and super-excellent Commixtion. Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 310.

superexcitation (sū'pér-ek-si-tá'shón), n. Excessive excitation.

Disturbances of the sensibility produce superexcitation which is subsequently replaced by exhaustion.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXI. 816.

superexcrecence (sū'pér-eks-kres'ens), n. A superfluous outgrowth. Wiseman, Surgery.

superfamily (sū'pér-fam'i-lí), n. In biol., a group of families, or a group of a grade next above the family. Thus, the monkeys of the New World constitute a superfamily, Ceboidae or Platyrrhina, contrasting with those of the Old World, Simioidae or Catarrhina. The superfamily formally intervenes between the family and the suborder; some authors are fond of this refinement, and the term is much used; but the difference between a suborder and a superfamily is not obvious.

superfecundation (sū'pér-fek-un-dá'shón), n. The fertilization of two ova at the same menstruation by two different acts of coition. This unquestionably occurs in woman.

superfecundity (sū'pér-fé-knu'dí-tí), n. Superabundant fecundity, or multiplication of the species. Macaulay, Sadler's Ref. Refuted.

superfetate (sū'pér-fé-tát), v. i.; pret. and pp. superfetated, ppr. superfetating. [Formerly also superfutate; < L. superfutatus, pp. of superfutare, conceive anew when already pregnant, < super, above, + futare, bring forth, breed: see fetus.] To conceive after a prior conception.

The female brings forth twice in one month, and so is said to superfetate, which . . . is because her eggs are hatched in her one after another. N. Grex, Museum.

superfetation (sū'pér-fé-tá'shón), n. [Formerly also superfutation; = F. superfetation = Sp. superfetación = Pg. superfetação = It. superfetazione, < L. as if superfutation* (n), < superfutare, superfetate: see superfutate.] 1. A second conception some time after a prior one, by which two fetuses of different age exist together in the same female: often used figuratively. The possibility of superfetation in the human female has been the subject of much investigation, but the weight of evidence goes to show that it may occur not only with double uteri, but also in the earlier period of pregnancy, under rare conditions, with normal single uterus. Also called superconception.

Here is superfetation, child upon child, and that which is more strange, twins at a latter conception.

Donne, Letters, lxx.

2. The fetus produced by superfetation; hence, any excrescent growth. [Rare.]

It then became a superfetation upon, and not an ingredient in, the national character. Coleridge.

superfetate (sū'pér-fét'), v. [Also superfate; < OF. superfeter, superfater, < L. superfutare, superfetate: see superfutate.] 1. intrans. To superfetate.

It makes me pregnant and to superfete.

Howell, Poem to Charles I., 1641.

II. trans. To conceive after a former conception.

381

His Brain may very well raise and superfete a second Thought. Howell, Letters, iv. 19.

superfibrination (sū'pér-fi-bri-ná'shón), n. Excessive tendency to form fibrin, or excess of fibrin in the blood.

superficie (sū'pér-fí), n. [< ME. superfice, < OF. superficie, surface: see superficies, surface.] Superficies; surface.

The zodiac in heaven is ymagined to be a superficie containing a latitude of 12 degrees. Chaucer, Astrolabe, i. 21.

The turned in water . . . filling the dusty trenches and long emptied cisterns, and a while after covering in many places the superficies of the land. Sandys, Travailes, p. 76.

superficial (sū'pér-físh'ál), a. [< ME. superficial, < OF. superficialis, F. superficiel = Pr. Sp. Pg. superficial = It. superficiale, < LL. superficialis, of or pertaining to the surface: see superficies.] 1. Lying in or on, or pertaining to, the superficies or surface; not penetrating below the surface, literally or figuratively; being only on the surface; not reaching to the interior or essence; shallow: as, a superficial color; a superficial resemblance.

Whenne the must boileth some of the grape That wol rise and be superficial, So take hem that nought oon of hem escape.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 202.

The discovery of flint tools or celts in the superficial formations in many parts of the world.

Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 31.

2. Of persons or their mental states or acts, comprehending only what is apparent or obvious; not deep or profound; not thorough.

This superficial tale

Is but a preface of her worthy praise.

Shak., I. Hen. VI., v. 5. 10.

Their knowledge is so very superficial, and so ill-grounded, that it is impossible for them to describe in what consists the beauty of these works. Dryden.

For how miserable will our Case be, if we have nothing but a superficial Faith, and a sort of Annular Devotion. Stillington, Sermons, III. ix.

He [Temple] seems to have been . . . a lively, agreeable young man of fashion, not by any means deeply read, but versed in all the superficial accomplishments of a gentleman. Macaulay, Sir William Temple.

Even the most practised and earnest minds must needs be superficial in the greater part of their attainments. J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 52.

3. In anat., not deep-seated or profound; lying on the surface of some part, or near but not on the surface of the whole body; subcutaneous; cutaneous: specifically said of various tissues and structures. — Superficial content or contents. See content. — Superficial deposits, the most recent of the geological formations; unconsolidated detrital material lying on or near the surface, and generally unstratified, or only very rudely stratified. Most of what is called diluvium, drift, or alluvium might be called by geologists a superficial deposit, especially if spoken of with reference to much older formations lying beneath. — Superficial fascia. See fascia, 7 (a). — Superficial reflexes. See reflex. — Superficial stomatitis. See stomatitis. = Syn. I. External, exterior, outer. — 2. Slight, smattering, shallow.

superficialist (sū'pér-físh'ál-ist), n. [< superficial + -ist.] One who attends to anything superficially; one of superficial attainments; a sciolist; a smatterer. Hervé, Beauties of Paris, I. 68.

superficialities (sū'pér-físh'ál-i-tí), n.; pl. superficialities (-tiz). [= F. superficialité = Sp. superficialidad = Pg. superficialidade = It. superficialità, *< LL. superficialitas (t)-s, superficialness, < superficialis, superficial: see superficial, Cf. superficially.] 1. The character of being superficial, in any (literal or figurative) sense; want of depth or thoroughness; shallowness.

She despised superficiality, and looked deeper than the color of things. Lamb, Mrs. Battle on Whist.

2. That which is superficial or shallow, in any (literal or figurative) sense; a superficial person or thing.

Purchasing acquittal . . . by a still harder penalty, that of being a triviality, superficiality, self-advertiser, and partial or total quack. Carlyle, Mirabeau.

superficialize (sū'pér-físh'ál-íz), v.; pret. and pp. superficialized, ppr. superficializing. [< superficial + -ize.] 1. trans. To treat or regard in a superficial, shallow, or slight manner. [Rare.]

It is a characteristic weakness of the day to superficialize evil; to spread a little cold cream over Pandemonium. Whipple, Lit. and Life, p. 188.

II. intrans. To be superficial or shallow; think, feel, or write superficially. [Rare.]

Better to elaborate the history of Greece or of Rome or of England than to superficialize in general history.

The Galaxy, March, 1871, p. 328.

It is sometimes so extremely violent that it forces the superincumbent strata, breaks them throughout, and thereby perfectly undermines and ruins their foundations.

Woodward.

It can scarce uplift

The weight of the superincumbent hour.

Shelley, Adonais, xxxii.

superinduce (sū-pēr-in-dūs), v. t.; pret. and pp. superinduced, ppr. superinducing. [< L. superinducere, draw over, bring upon, < super, over, + inducere, bring upon: see induce.] To bring in or upon as an addition to something; develop or bring into existence in addition to something else.

The anointment of God superinduceth a brotherhood in kings and bishops. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

Here are two imitations: first, the poet's of the sufferer; secondly, the actor's of both: poetry is superinduced.

Landor, Epicurus, Leontion, and Ternaissa.

superinvolution (sū-pēr-in-vō-lū'shon), n. Excessive involution.

superior (sū-pē'ri-ōr), a. and n. [Formerly also superiour; < OF. superieur, F. supérieur = Sp. Pg. superior = It. superiore, n. < L. superior, higher, in ML. as a noun, one higher, a superior, compar. (cf. superl. supremus, summus, highest) of superus, that is above, < super, over, above: see super-, and cf. supreme and sum.] I. a. 1. More elevated in place; higher; upper: as, the superior limb of the sun: opposed to inferior.

Now from the depth of hell they lift their sight,
And at a distance see superior light.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., Ceyx and Aleyone, l. 133.

2. In anat. and zool., upper in relative position or direction; uppermost with regard to something else: correlated with anterior, inferior, and posterior. The epithet was originally used in anatomical language to note the parts relatively so situated in man, and has caused much confusion in its extension to other animals, since that which is superior in man becomes anterior in most animals, and so on with the three correlated words. The tendency is now to replace these epithets with others not affected by the posture of the animal, as cephalic, caudal, dorsal, and ventral, with the corresponding adverbs ending in -ad.

The vague ambiguity of such terms as superior, inferior, anterior, posterior, etc., must have been felt and acknowledged by every person the least versant with anatomical description.
Dr. John Barclay, A New Anatomical Nomenclature (1803).

3. In bot.: (a) Placed higher, as noting the relative position of the calyx and ovary: thus, the ovary is superior when the calyx is quite free from it, as normally; the calyx is superior when from being adnate to the ovary it appears to spring from its top. (b) Next the axis; belonging to the part of an axillary flower which is toward the main stem. Also called posterior. (c) Pointing toward the apex of the fruit; ascending: said of the radicle.—4. Higher in rank or office; more exalted in dignity: as, a superior officer; a superior degree of nobility.

The apostles in general, in their ordinary offices, . . . were superior to the seventy-two, the antecessors of the presbyterate.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 163.

5. Higher or greater in respect to some quality or property; possessed or manifested in a higher (or, absolutely, very high) degree: applied to persons and things, and to their qualities and properties; surpassing others in the greatness, goodness, extent, or value of any quality; in math., greater.

Honesty has no fence against superior cunning.
Swift, Gulliver's Travels, i. 6.

His [Dryden's] claims on the gratitude of James were superior to those of any man of letters in the Kingdom.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vii.

The French were superior in the number and condition of their cavalry.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 12.

Nor do I know anything in ivory carving superior to the panels of the tomb [Maximilian's] itself.
C. D. Warner, Roundabout Journey, p. 70.

6. Being beyond the power or influence of something; too great or firm to be subdued or affected by something; above: used only predicatively or appositively: with to: as, a man superior to revenge. Sometimes used sarcastically, as of an assumed quality, without to: as, he smiled with a superior air.

Great Mother, let me once be able To have a Garden, House, and stable,
That I may read, and ride, and plant,
Superior to Desire, or Want.
Prior, Written at Paris, 1700.

7. In logic, less in comprehension; less determinate; having less depth, and consequently commonly wider.

Biped is a genus with reference to man and bird, but a species with respect to the superior genus, animal.
J. S. Mill, Logic, l. vii. § 3.

Superior conjunction, in astron. See conjunction, 2.—Superior Court. It. superlativo = G. superlativ, < LL. superlativus, exaggerated, hyperbolic, superlative, < L. superlatus, used as pp. of superferre, carry over or beyond, raise high, < super, above, + ferre = E. bear.] I. a. 1. Raised to or occupying the highest pitch, position, or degree; most eminent; surpassing all other; supreme: as, a man of superlative wisdom.

Ther nys no thyng in gree superlatyf,
As seith Senek, above an humble wyf.
Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 131.

Here beauty is superlative.
Beau. and FL., Laws of Candy, ii. 1.

2. In gram., noting that form of an adjective or an adverb which expresses the highest or utmost degree of the quality or manner: as, the superlative degree of comparison.

II. n. 1. That which is highest or of most eminence; the utmost degree.

Thus doing, you shall be most faye, most rich, most wise, most all; you shall dwell vpon Superlatives.
Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie.

2. In gram.: (a) The superlative degree of adjectives or adverbs, which is formed in English by the termination -est, as, meanest, highest, bravest; hence, also, the equivalent phrase made by the use of most, as most high, most brave; or even of least, as least amiable.

Some have a violent and turgid manner of talking and thinking; they are always in extremes, and pronounce concerning everything in the superlative.
Watts.

(b) A word or phrase in the superlative degree: as, to make much use of superlatives.

I well know the peril which lies in superlatives—they were made for the use of very young persons.
Joshua Quincy, Figures of the Past, p. 334.

superlatively (sū-pēr-lā-tiv-li), adv. In a superlative manner or degree; in the highest or utmost degree. Bacon.

superlativeness (sū-pēr-lā-tiv-nes), n. The state or character of being superlative. Bailey, 1727.

superline (sū-pēr-līn), n. A two-dimensional linear continuum in five-dimensional space.

superlinear (sū-pēr-līn'ē-ār), n. In math., a determinant.

superlucratus (sū-pēr-lū'krāt), c. t. [< L. superlucratus, pp. of superlucrare, gain in addition, < L. super, above, + lucrari, gain: see lucry, r.] To gain in addition; gain extraordinarily.

As hath been proved, the people of England do thrive, and . . . it is possible they might superlucrate twenty-five millions per annum.

Petty, Political Arithmetick, p. 197. (Encyc. Brit.) superlucration (sū-pēr-lū'krā'shon), n. [< superlucrate + -tion.] Extraordinary gain; gain in addition.

superlunar (sū-pēr-lū'nār), a. [< L. super, above, + luna, the moon: see lunar.] Being above the moon; not sublunary or of this world. Pope.

superlunary (sū-pēr-lū'ng-ri), a. Same as superlunar.

Other ambition than of crowns in air,
And superlunary felicities.
Thy bosom warm. Young, Night Thoughts, vi.

superlunatic (sū-pēr-lū-nat'i-kāl), a. Lunatic in the extreme; insane to an extraordinary degree. [Rare.]

First Rabbi Basy, thou superlunatic hypocrite.
B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, v. 3.

supermolecule (sū-pēr-mol'e-kūl), n. A compounded molecule, or combination of two molecules of different substances.

supermundane (sū-pēr-mun'dān), a. [< L. super, above, + mundus, the world: see mundane.] Being above the world; superior to the world or earthly things.

supernacular (sū-pēr-nak'ū-lār), a. [< supernaculum + -ar.] Having the quality of supernaculum; of first-rate quality; very good; said of liquor.

Some white hermitage at the Haws (by the way, the butler only gave me half a glass each time) was supernacular.
Thackeray, Book of Snobs, xxi.

supernaculum (sū-pēr-nak'ū-lum), adv. and n. [Prop. an adverbial phrase, NL. super naculum, 'on the nail': L. super, above, upon; NL. naculum, < G. nagel, nail: see nail.] I. adv. On the nail: used of drinking, with reference to the custom of turning the glass over the thumb to show that there was only a drop left small enough to rest on the nail: as, to drink supernaculum.

To drink supernaculum was an ancient custom, not only in England, but also in several other parts of Europe, of emptying the cup or glass, and then pouring the drop or two that remained at the bottom upon the person's nail that drank it, to show that he was no flincher.
Brand, Pop. Antiq. (ed. 1813), II. 238.

II. n. Wine good enough to be worth drinking to the bottom; good liquor; hence, anything very fine or enjoyable.

Gab. For the cup's sake I'll bear the cupbearer.
Idem. 'Tis here! the supernaculum! twenty years
Of age, if 'tis a day. Byron, Werner, i. 1.

And empty to each radiant comer
A supernaculum of summer. Lowell, Eurydice.

supernal (sū-pēr-nāl), a. [= It. supernab, < L. supernus, that is above, on high, upper: see supern. Cf. infernal.] 1. Being in a higher or upper place; situated above: as, supernal regions.

Then down she [Fortune] thrustes from their supernal seat Princes & kings, & makes them begg their meat.
Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 125.

2. Relating to things above; celestial; heavenly.
That supernal judge that stirs good thoughts.
Shaks., K. John, ii. 1. 112.

God
... will send his winged messengers
On errands of supernal grace.

Milton, P. L., vii. 573.

3. In zoöl., superior in position; situated high up: as, the supernal nostrils of a bird.

supernatant (sü-për-nä'tant), a. [< L. supernatus (supernatus), pp. of supernare, swim above, float, < super, above, + nare, swim; see nant.] Swimming above; floating on the surface.

After the urinous spirit had precipitated the gold into a fine calx, the supernatant liquor was highly tinged with blue, that betrayed the alloy of copper, that did not before appear.

Boyle, Works, III. 421.

supernatation (sü-për-nä-tä'shon), n. [< L. supernatus (supernatus), < supernare, swim above, float; see supernatant.] The act of floating on the surface of a fluid. Bacon: Sir T. Browne.

supernatural (sü-për-nat'ü-räl), a. and n. [< OF. supernaturel, also surnaturel, F. surnaturel = Sp. Pg. sobrenatural = It. supernaturale, < ML. supernaturalis, being above nature, divine, < L. super, above, + natura, nature; see natural.] I. a. 1. Being beyond or exceeding the powers or laws of nature; not occurring, done, bestowed, etc., through the operation of merely physical laws, but by an agency above and separate from these.

All these gyftes God gaue hym above hys naturales, and not for himself onely, but for him and al his posteritye. But all these supernatural gyftes he gaue him with the knot of this condition: that is to wytte, that, yf hee brake hys commaundment, then shuld he lese them al.

Sir T. More, Works, p. 1286.

2. Of or pertaining to that which is above or beyond nature.

Of all the numbers arithmetically,
The number three is heald for principall,
As well in natural philosophy
As supernatural theologie.

Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 148.

Supernatural perfection. See perfection. = Syn. 1. Supernatural, Miraculous, Preternatural, Superhuman, Unnatural, Extra-natural. That which is supernatural is above nature; that which is preternatural or extra-natural is outside of nature; that which is unnatural is contrary to nature, but not necessarily impossible. Supernatural is freely applicable to persons: as, supernatural visitants; preternatural sometimes; unnatural only in another sense. Supernatural is applied to beings, properties, powers, acts, in the realms of being recognized as higher than man's. In the following extract supernatural is used in the sense ordinarily expressed by extra-natural or miraculous.

That is supernatural, whatever it be, that is either not in the chain of natural cause and effect, or which acts on the chain of cause and effect, in nature, from without the chain.

H. Bushnell, Nature and the Supernat., p. 37.

The raising of the dead to life would be miraculous, because, if brought about by a law of nature, it would be by a law outside of and above any that are known to man, and perhaps overruling some law or laws of nature. Preternatural is used especially to note that which might have been a work of nature, but is not. That which is superhuman is above the nature or powers of man. Superhuman is often used by hyperbole to note that which is very remarkable in man: as, he exhibited superhuman strength; the other words may be similarly used in a lower sense.

II. n. That which is above or beyond the established course or laws of nature; something transcending nature; supernatural agencies, influence, phenomena, etc.: with the definite article.

If we pass from the Fathers into the middle ages, we find ourselves in an atmosphere that was dense and charged with the supernatural.

Lecky, Rationalism, I. 157.

supernaturalism (sü-për-nat'ü-räl-izm), n. [< supernatural + -ism.] 1. The state or character of being supernatural. — 2. Belief in the supernatural. Specifically — (a) The doctrine that there is a personal God who is superior to and supreme in nature, and directs and controls it: in this sense opposed to naturalism. (b) The doctrine that this power has controlled and directed the forces of nature in the miraculous events recorded in the Bible, and does continue to direct and control them, though not in a miraculous way, in special providences in answer to prayer: in this sense opposed to rationalism.

Also supranaturalism.

supernaturalist (sü-për-nat'ü-räl-ist), n. and a. [< supernatural + -ist.] I. n. One who believes in the supernatural; a believer in supernaturalism. Also called supranaturalist.

II. a. Same as supernaturalistic.

supernaturalistic (sü-për-nat'ü-räl-ist'ik), a. [< supernaturalist + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of supernaturalism.

The purely external and supernaturalistic Socinian and Priestleyan legacy.

Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 726.

supernaturality (sü-për-nat'ü-räl'i-ti), n. [< supernatural + -ity.] The state or quality of being supernatural; supernaturalness. [Rare.]

supernaturalize (sü-për-nat'ü-räl-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. supernaturalized, pp. supernaturalizing. [< supernatural + -ize.] To treat or consider as belonging or pertaining to a supernatural state; elevate into the region of the supernatural; render supernatural.

She [Beatrice] early began to undergo that change into something rich and strange in the sea of his [Dante's] mind which so completely supernaturalized her at last.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 65.

supernaturally (sü-për-nat'ü-räl-i), adv. In a supernatural manner; in a manner exceeding the established course or laws of nature.

supernaturalness (sü-për-nat'ü-räl-nes), n. The state or character of being supernatural.

supernegative (sü-për-neg'ä-tiv), a. Containing a double negative.

supernodality (sü-për-nod'i-käl), a. [< super + nod(dy) + -ic.] Excessive; supreme.

O, supernodality fool: wel, Ie take your

Two shillings, but Ie bar striking at legs.

Taming of a Shrew, p. 185. (Haltiwell.)

supernormal (sü-për-nör'mäl), a. Above or beyond what is normal; unusual or extraordinary, but not abnormal. Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, III. 30. [Rare.]

supernumerary (sü-për-nü'më-rä-ri), a. and n. [= F. surnuméraire = Sp. Pg. supernumerario = It. supranumerario, < L. supernumerarius, in excess, counted in over and above, < L. super, above, + numerus, number; see number, numery.] I. a. 1. Exceeding a number stated or prescribed: as, a supernumerary officer in a regiment.

The odd or supernumerary six hours are not accounted in the three years after the leap year.

Holder.

2. Exceeding a necessary or usual number.

The school hath curious questions: whether this was one of Adam's necessary and substantial parts, or a superfluous and supernumerary rib?

Rev. T. Adams, Works, III. 140.

Supernumerary breast, an additional mammary gland. — Supernumerary kidney, an additional mass of kidney-structure situated in the neighborhood of, but separate from, the true kidney. — Supernumerary rainbow. See rainbow.

II. n.; pl. supernumeraries (-riz). A person or thing beyond the number stated, or beyond what is necessary or usual; especially, a person not formally a member of a regular body or staff of officials or employees, but retained or employed to act as an assistant or substitute in case of necessity.

To-day there was an extra table spread for expected supernumeraries, and it was at this that Christian took his place with some of the younger farmers, who had almost a sense of dissipation in talking to a man of his questionable station and unknown experience.

George Eliot, Felix Holt, xx.

Specifically — (a) A military officer attached to a corps or arm of the service where no vacancy exists. Such an officer receives, in the United States army, the rank of brevet second lieutenant, or additional second lieutenant. (b) Theat., one not belonging to the regular company, who appears on the stage, but has no lines to speak. Often colloquially abbreviated super and suppe.

supernumerous (sü-për-nü'më-rus), a. Over-numerous; superabundant. Fuller, Worthies, Northampton, ii. 182. (Davies.) [Rare.]

supernutrition (sü-për-nü-trish'ön), n. Excessive nutrition; hypertrophy.

superoccipital (sü-për-ok-sip'i-täl), a. and n. I. a. Situated at or near the upper part of the occipital; of or pertaining to the superoccipital: specifically noting one of the lateral occipital gyri of the brain.

II. n. The superior median element of the compound occipital bone. It is either a distinct bone, as in sundry lower vertebrates and early stages of higher ones, or is fused with other elements of the occipital bone. In man it forms the expanded upper and back part of the bone, and is developed in membrane. See cuts under Balanidæ, craniofacial, Gallinæ, Felidæ, periotic, skull, Pythaidæ, teleost, and Trematosaurus.

Also supra-occipital.

super-octave (sü-për-ok'täv), n. In music: (a) An organ-stop two octaves above the principal.

(b) A coupler in the organ, by means of which the performer, on striking any key on the manuals, sounds the note an octave above the one struck.

superolateral (sü-pe-rö-lät'e-räl), a. Situated high up on the side (of something); lateral and above (something else).

superomarginal (sü-pe-rö-mär'ji-näl), a. Same as supramarginal.

superomnivallent (sü-për-om-niv'ä-lënt), a. Supremely powerful over all. [Rare.]

God by powre super-omnivallent.

Davies, Mirum in Modum, p. 22. (Davies.)

superorder (sü-për-ör'dër), n. In nat. hist., a classificatory group next above the order but below the class. It may be a combination of orders, or a single order contrasting with such a combination; it is not well distinguished from subclass.

superordinal (sü-për-ör'di-näl), a. Of the classificatory rank or value of a superorder; pertaining to a superorder: as, superordinal groups or distinctions.

superordinary (sü-për-ör'di-nä-ri), a. Better than the ordinary or common; excellent.

superordinate (sü-për-ör'di-nät), a. Related as a universal proposition to a particular one in the same terms.

One group is superordinate to another when it is regarded as the higher under which the other takes its place as lower.

W. L. Davidson, Mind, XII. 234.

superordination (sü-për-ör'di-nä'shon), n. [< L. superordinatio (n-), < superordinare, appoint in addition, < L. super, above, + ordinare, ordain, appoint; see ordin, ordinate.] 1. The ordination of a person to fill an office still occupied, as the ordination by an ecclesiastic of one to fill his office when it shall become vacant by his own death or otherwise.

After the death of Augustine, Laurentius, a Roman, succeeded him; whom Augustine, in his lifetime, not only designed for, but "ordained in that place." . . . Such a superordination in such cases was canonical, it being a tradition that St. Peter in like manner consecrated Clement his successor in the Church of Rome.

Fuller, Church Hist., II. ii. 27.

2. In logic, the relation of a universal proposition to a particular proposition in the same terms.

superorganic (sü-për-ör-gan'ik), a. 1. Being above or beyond organization; not dependent upon organization: noting psychical or spiritual things considered apart from the organisms by or through which they are manifested: as, "the interdependence of organic and superorganic life," G. H. Lewes. — 2. Social, with the implication that society is something like a physiological organism, but of a higher mode of coordination.

superosculate (sü-për-os'kü-lät), v. t. To touch at more consecutive points than usually suffice to determine the locus of a given order. Thus, a conic having six consecutive points in common with a cubic is said to superosculate it.

superoxygenation (sü-për-ok'si-jë-nä'shon), n. Oxygenation, as of the blood, to an unusual or excessive degree.

superparasite (sü-për-par'a-sit), n. In zoöl., a parasite of a parasite. Also hyperparasite.

superparasitic (sü-për-par'a-sit'ik), a. [< superparasite + -ic.] Pertaining to superparasitism; of the nature of a superparasite; hyperparasitic. Encyc. Brit., VI. 647.

superparasitism (sü-për-par'a-si-tizm), n. [< superparasite + -ism.] The infestation of parasites by other parasites; hyperparasitism.

superparticular (sü-për-pär'tik'ü-lär), a. [< L. superparticularis (se. numerus), containing a number and an aliquot part of it besides, < L. super, over, + particula, a part, particle; see particular.] In the ratio of a number to the next lower number. A superparticular multiple is a number one more than a multiple of another. The smaller number is in the former case said to be subsuperparticular, and in the latter a superparticular submultiple.

superparticularity (sü-për-pär'tik'ü-lär'i-ti), n. The state of being superparticular.

superpartient (sü-për-pär'ti-ënt), a. [< L. superpartiens (t-s), containing a number and several aliquot parts of it besides, < L. super, above, + partire, share, divide, distribute; see part, r.] In the ratio of a number to a number less by several units. If the latter number is less than a sum-multiple, the former is said to be a superpartient multiple. The smaller number is in the former case said to be subsuperpartient, and in the latter a superpartient submultiple.

superphosphate (sü-për-fos'fat), n. 1. A phosphate containing the greatest amount of phosphoric acid that can combine with the base. — 2. A trade-name for various phosphates, such as bone, bone-black, and phosphorite, which have been treated with sulphuric acid to increase their solubility, and so render them more available in agriculture as fertilizers.

superphysical (sü-për-fiz'ikäl), a. Superorganic; independent of or not explicable by physical laws of the organism; psychical; spiritual.

superplant (sü-për-plant), n. A plant growing on another plant; a parasite; an epiphyte.

We find no super-plant that is a formed plant but mistletoe.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 556.

superpleaser (sü-për-plëz'), v. t. To please exceedingly. [Rare.]

He is confident it shall superplease judicious spectators.

B. Jonson, Magnetick Lady, Ind.

superplus (sü-për-plus), n. [< ML. superplus, excess, surplus, < L. super, above, + plus, more;

see plus. Cf. surplus, overplus.] Surplus; excess.

If this be the case, there must be a superplus of the other sex. Goldsmith, Female Warriors.

superplusage (sū'pēr-plus'āj), n. [< ML. superplusagium, < superplus, excess; see superplus. Cf. superlavage.] Excess; surplusage. Felt, Hammond, p. 3.

superpolitic (sū'pēr-pol'i-tik), a. Over-politic. God hath satisfied either the superpolitic or the simple sort of ministers with their own delusions. Bp. Gauden, Tears of the Church, p. 251. (Davies.)

To uphold the decrepit Papacy [the Jesuits] have invented this superpolitic Aphorism, as one terms it, One Pope and one King. Milton, Reformation in Eng., ii.

superponderate (sū'pēr-pon'dér-āt), r. t. To weigh over and above. Bailey.

superposable (sū'pēr-pō-zā-bl), a. [< superpose + -able.] Capable of being superposed; not interfering with one another, or not rendering one another impossible, as two displacements or strains. Encyc. Brit., XXIV, 451.

superpose (sū'pēr-pōz'), r. t.; pret. and pp. superposed, pp. superposing. [< F. superposer, < super- + poser, put; see pose. Cf. Sp. superponer, superponer = Pg. sobrepor = It. sovrapporre, < L. superponere, pp. superpositus, lay upon, < super, over, upon, + ponere, lay; see ponat.] 1. To lay or place upon or over, as one kind of rock on another.

New social relations are superposed on the old.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 439.

2. In bot., to place vertically over some other part: specifically used of arranging one whorl of organs opposite or over another instead of alternately.

superposition (sū'pēr-pō-zish'ōn), n. [= F. superposition = Sp. superposición = Pg. sobreposição = It. sovrapposizione, < LL. superpositio(n)-, < L. superponere, lay upon; see superpose.] 1. The act of superposing; a placing above or upon; a lying or being situated above or upon something else.

Before leaving Hullabid, it may be well again to call attention to the order of superposition of the different animal friezes, alluded to already, when speaking of the rock-cut monastery described by the Chinese Pilgrims.

J. Fergusson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 403.

2. In bot., same as anteposition, 2.—3. Specifically, in geol., noting the relations of stratified formations to one another from the point of view of the relative time of their deposition. That underlying beds are older than those which cover them is called the law of superposition. The apparent exceptions to this law are those instances in which stratified masses have been so disturbed and overturned since their deposition that older beds have been made to rest upon newer ones.

4. In geom., the ideal operation of carrying one magnitude to the space occupied by another, and showing that they can be made to coincide throughout their whole extent. This is the method of Euclid, to which his axiom, that things which coincide are equal, refers; but the use of the word superpose in this sense appears to be due to Auguste Comte (French superposer).

5. In the early church, an addition to or extension of a fast; a fast longer than the ordinary fast. Bingham, Antiquities, xxi. 3.

superpraise (sū'pēr-prāz'), r. t. To praise to excess. Shak., M. N. D., iii. 2, 153.

superproportion (sū'pēr-prō-pōr'shōn), n. Excess of proportion. Sir K. Digby.

superpurgation (sū'pēr-pēr-gā'shōn), n. More purgation than is sufficient. Wiseman, Surgery.

superquadripartient (sū'pēr-kwōd-ri-pār'ti-ent), a. [LL. superquadripartien(t)-s.] Being in the ratio of 9 to 5.

superquadripartient (sū'pēr-kwōd-ri-kwīn'tal), a. Same as superquadripartient.

superreflection (sū'pēr-rēflek'shōn), n. The reflection of a reflected image; the echo of an echo.

The voice in that chapel createth speciem speciei, and maketh succeeding super-reflections; for it melteth by degrees, and every reflexion is weaker than the former.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 249.

superregal (sū'pēr-rē'gal), a. More than regal. Waterland, Works, III, 348.

superreward (sū'pēr-rē-wārd'), r. t. To reward to excess. Bacon, To King James.

superroyal (sū'pēr-roi'al), a. Noting a size of paper. See paper.

supersacral (sū'pēr-sā'kral), a. In anat., situated on or over (dorsal of) the sacrum; as, the supersacral foramina, processes, or nerves.

supersaliency (sū'pēr-sā'li-ēn-si), n. [< supersalient(t) + -cy.] The act of leaping on anything. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 1. [Rare.]

supersalient (sū'pēr-sā'li-ent), a. [= OF. sursallant = Sp. Pg. sobresaliente, < L. super, on, + salient(t)-s, pp. of salire, leap.] Leaping upon. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

supersalt (sū'pēr-sāl't), n. An acid salt; a salt with a greater number of equivalents of acid than base: opposed to subsalt. H. Spencer, Universal Progress, p. 40.

supersaturate (sū'pēr-sat'ū-rāt), r. t. To saturate to excess; add to beyond saturation.

A recently magnetised magnet will occasionally appear to be supersaturated.

S. P. Thompson, Elect. and Mag., p. 85.

supersaturation (sū'pēr-sat'ū-rā'shōn), n. The operation of saturating to excess, or of adding to beyond saturation; the state of being supersaturated.

superscapular (sū'pēr-skāp'ū-lār), a. Same as suprascapular.

superscribe (sū'pēr-skrib'), r. t.; pret. and pp. superscribed, pp. superscribing. [= Sp. sobrescribir = It. soprascrivere, < L. superscribere, write over, write upon, superscribe, < super, over, + scribere, write; see scribe.] 1. To write or engrave on the top, outside, or surface; inscribe; put an inscription on.

An ancient monument, superscribed.

Addison.

2. To write the name or address of one on the outside or cover of: as, to superscribe a letter.

Produces Mounseieur's letter, superscribed to her Majesty.

Aubrey, Lives (Sylvanus Secoy).

superscript (sū'pēr-skript), a. and n. [= Sp. Pg. sobrescrito = It. soprascritto, < L. superscriptus, pp. of superscribere, superscribe; see superscribe.] I. a. Written over or above the line: the opposite of subscript. Amer. Jour. Philol., IX, 321.

II. n. The address of a letter; superscription. Shak., L. L. L., iv. 2, 135.

superscription (sū'pēr-skrip'shōn), n. [< OF. superscription = It. soprascrizione, < L. superscriptio(n)-, a writing above, < superscribere, write over; see superscribe.] 1. The act of superscribing.—2. That which is written or engraved on the outside of or above something else; especially, an address on a letter.

The superscription of his accusation was written over, THE KING OF THE JEWS. Mark xv. 26.

supersecular (sū'pēr-sek'ū-lār), a. Being above the world or secular things. Bp. Hall.

supersede (sū'pēr-sēd'), r. t.; pret. and pp. superseded, pp. superseding. [< OF. superseder, superceder, F. superséder (vernacularly OF. and F. surseoir, leave off, desist, delay, defer, < L. supersedere, sit upon or above, preside, also, in a deflected use, commonly with the abl., desist from, refrain from, forbear, omit, ML. also postpone, defer, < super, above, + sedere, sit; see sedent, sit. In OF. (superceder) and ML. (supercedere) the verb was confused with L. cedere, go; see cede. Hence ult. (< L. supersedere) E. surseue, confused with cease.] 1. To make void, inefficacious, or useless by superior power, or by coming in the place of; set aside; render unnecessary; suspend; stay.

In this genuine acceptance of chance, here is nothing supposed that can supersede the known laws of natural motion.

Bentley, Boyle Lectures, sermon v.

It is a sad sight . . . to see these political schemers, with their clumsy mechanisms, trying to supersede the great laws of existence. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 322.

2. To be placed in or take the room of; displace; supplant; replace; as, an officer superseded by another.

A black and savage atrocity of mind, which supersedes in them the common feelings of nature.

Burke, Rev. in France.

One deep love doth supersede

All other. Tennyson, In Memoriam, xxxii.

supersedeas (sū'pēr-sē'dē-as), n. [So called from this word in the writ: L. supersedeas, 2d pers. sing. pres. subj. of supersedere, forbear; see supersede.] 1. In law, a writ having in general the effect of a command to stay, on good cause shown, some ordinary proceedings which could otherwise to have proceeded.

A writ of supersedeas was issued to prevent the meeting of parliament, and the city was filled with the armed followers of the duke. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 330.

2. Hence, a stay; a stop.

To give a supersedeas to industry.

Hammond, Works, I, 480.

superseder (sū'pēr-sē'dēr), n. One who or that which supersedes. Browning, Paracelsus.

supersedere (sū'pēr-se-dē-rē), n. [So called from this word in the contract or writ: L. supersedere, forbear; see supersede.] In Scots law: (a) A private agreement among creditors, under a trust-deed and accession, that they will supersede or sist diligence for a certain period. (b) A judicial act by which the court, where it sees cause, grants a debtor protection against diligence, without consent of the creditors.

supersedure (sū'pēr-sē'dū-rē), n. [< supersede + -ure.] The act of superseding; supersession; as, the supersedure of trial by jury.

To suppose it necessary to undertake the supersedure by stealth. The Century, XXIX, 122.

superseminate (sū'pēr-sem'i-nāt), r. t. [< LL. superseminatus, pp. of superseminare (< Sp. sobreseminar = Pg. sobreseminar, sow over or upon, < L. super, over, + seminare, sow; see seminate).] To scatter (seed) above seed already sown; also, to disseminate.

The church . . . was against . . . punishing difference in opinion, till the popes of Rome did superseminate and persuade the contrary.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1820), II, 3-2.

supersemination (sū'pēr-sem-i-nā'shōn), n. [< superseminate + -ion.] The sowing of seed over seed already sown.

They were no more than tares, . . . and . . . of another sowing (a supersemination, as the Vulgar reads it).

Heglin, Reformation (Ded.), (Davies.)

superseminator (sū'pēr-sem-i-nā-tōr), n. [< LL. superseminator, < superseminare, sow over; see superseminate.] One who superseminates. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II, 148.

supersensible (sū'pēr-sen'si-bl), a. Beyond the reach of the senses; above the natural powers of external perception; supersensual; applied either to that which is physical but of such a nature as not to be perceptible by any normal sense, or to that which is spiritual and so not an object of any possible sense.

The scientific mind and the logical mind, when turned towards the supersensible world, are apt to find the same difficulty, only in a much greater degree, as they find in dealing with objects of imagination, or with pure emotions. J. C. Sharpe, Culture and Religion, p. 113.

Atoms are supersensible beings.

G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 676.

supersensibly (sū'pēr-sen'si-blī), adv. In a supersensible manner. A. B. Alcott, Tablets, p. 16.

supersensitive (sū'pēr-sen'si-tiv), a. Excessively sensitive; morbidly sensitive.

Her supersensitive ear detects the scratch of her mother's pen. E. S. Phelps, Sealed Orders, p. 300.

supersensitiveness (sū'pēr-sen'si-tiv-nes), n. Morbid sensibility; excessive sensitiveness; extreme susceptibility.

supersensory (sū'pēr-sen'sō-ri), a. Supersensual. [Rare.]

This definite line embraced all that mass of actual or alleged instances in which the mind of one person has been impressed by that of another through supersensory channels, or at least in a way which could not be accounted for by the ordinary modes of communication through the senses. New Princeton Rev., IV, 274.

supersensual (sū'pēr-sen'sū-āl), a. Above or beyond the senses; of such a nature as not to be perceptible by sense, or not by sense with which man is endowed; specifically, spiritual. Also used substantively.

In our inmost hearts there is a sentiment which links the ideal of beauty with the Supersensual.

Baile, What will he do with it? vii. 23.

Everything, the most supersensual, presented itself to his (Dante's) mind, not as an abstract idea, but as a visible type. Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 29.

supersensuous (sū'pēr-sen'sū-us), a. 1. Supersensible; supersensual.

A faithless supersensuous and ideal . . . is a covert superstition. A. B. Alcott, Tablets, p. 182.

2. Extremely sensuous; more than sensuous. Imp. Dict.

superserviceable (sū'pēr-sēr'vi-sā-bl), a. Over-serviceable or officious; doing more than is required or desired.

A . . . superserviceable, finical rogue.

Shak., Lear, ii. 2, 19.

supersphenoidal (sū'pér-sfē-noi'dal), a. Situated on or over (cephalad or dorsad of) the sphenoid bone; as, the supersphenoidal pituitary fossa or body.

superspiritual (sū'pér-spir'i-tū'al), a. Excessively spiritual; over-spiritual.

superspirituality (sū'pér-spir'i-tū'al'i-ti), n. The quality or state of being superspiritual.

This extreme, unreal superspirituality is a relic of the old Zoroastrian doctrine of Dualism.

G. D. Bourdau, Creative Week, p. 286.

supersquamosal (sū'pér-skwā-mō'sal), n. A bone of the skull of ichthyosaurs, behind the postfrontal and postorbital. Owen.

superstition (sū'pér-stish'on), n. [Early mod. E. superstition, supersticion; < OF. (and F.) superstition = Sp. superstición = Pg. superstição = It. superstizione, superstition, < L. superstitio (n), excessive fear of the gods, unreasonable religious belief, superstition; connected with superstes (superstit), standing by, being present (as a noun, a bystander, a witness), also standing over, as in triumph, also, in another use, surviving, remaining, < superstare, stand upon or over, also survive, < super, over, above, + stare, stand; see state, stand. As in the case of religio (n), religio (n), religion (see religion), the exact original sense of superstitio (n) is uncertain; it is supposed to have been a 'standing over something' in amazement or awe. The explanation (reflected, e. g., in the quot. from Lowell, below) that it means lit. 'a survival' (namely, of savage or barbarous beliefs generally outgrown) is modern, and is entirely foreign to Roman thought.] 1. An ignorant or irrational fear of that which is unknown or mysterious; especially, such fear of some invisible existence or existences; specifically, religious belief or practice, or both, founded on irrational fear or credulity; excessive or unreasonable religious scruples produced by credulous fears.

First Sail. Sir, your queen must overboard: the sea works high, the wind is loud, and will not lie till the ship be cleared of the dead.

Per. That's your superstition. Shak., Pericles, iii. 1. 50.

It were better to have no opinion of God at all than such an opinion as is unworthy of Him; for the one is unbelief, the other is contumely; and certainly superstition is the reproach of the Deity. Bacon, Superstition.

Where there is any religion, the devil will plant superstition. Barton, Anat., of Mel., p. 599.

He [Canon Kingsley] defines superstition to be an unreasoning fear of the unknown. Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 216.

A superstition, as its name imports, is something that has been left to stand over, like unfinished business, from one session of the world's witenagemot to the next. Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 92.

2. A religious belief or a system of religion regarded as based on ignorance and fear; especially, the worship of false gods, as induced by fear; pagan religious doctrines and practices.

He destroyed all idolatry and clearly did extirpate all superstition. Latimer, Sermon of the Plough.

Under their Druid-teachers, the heathen Britons made use of balls of crystal in their idle superstitions and wicked practices. Rock, Church of our Fathers, i. 294.

3. Hence, any false or unreasonable belief tenaciously held; as, popular superstitions.

Of the political superstitions, . . . none is so universally diffused as the notion that majorities are omnipotent. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 232.

4t. Excessive nicety; scrupulous exactness.—5t. Idolatrous devotion.

May I not kiss you now in superstition?

For you appear a thing that I would kneel to.

Fletcher (and Mussinger), Lovers' Progress, iii. 3.

= Syn. 1-3. Superstition, Credulity, Fanaticism, Bigotry. Credulity is a general readiness to believe what one is told, without sufficient evidence. Superstition may be the result of credulity in regard to religious beliefs or duties or as to the supernatural. As compared with fanaticism it is a state of fears on the one side and rigorous observances on the other, both proceeding from an oppression of the mind by its beliefs, while fanaticism is too highly wrought in its excitement for fear or for attention to details of conduct. Fanaticism is a half-crazy substitution of fancies for reason, primarily in the field of religion, but secondarily in politics, etc. Fanaticism is demonstrative, being often ready to undertake, in obedience to its supposed duty or call by special revelation, tasks that are commonly considered wicked or treated as criminal. Bigotry is less a matter of action; subjectively it is a blind refusal to entertain the idea of correctness or excellence in religious opinions or practices other than one's own; objectively it is an attitude matching such a state of mind. Credulity is opposed to skepticism, superstition to irreverence, fanaticism to intemperance, bigotry to latitude or latitude. See enthusiasm.

superstitionist (sū'pér-stish'on-ist), n. [< superstition + -ist.] One who is superstitious; one who is bound by religious superstitions. Dr. H. More.

superstitious (sū'pér-stish'us), a. [Formerly also superstitions; = F. superstitieux = Sp. Pg. supersticioso = It. superstizioso, < L. superstitiosus, full of superstition, superstitious, also soothsaying, prophetic, ML. also extraordinary, ambiguous, < superstitia (n), superstition; see superstition.] 1. Believing superstitions, religious or other; addicted to superstition; especially, very scrupulous and rigid in religious observances through fear or credulity; full of idle fancies and scruples in regard to religion.

Devised by the religious persons of those days to abuse the superstitious people, and to enumber their basic braynes with vaine hope or vaine feare. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 218.

2. Pertaining to, partaking of, or proceeding from superstition; as, superstitious rites.

They pretend not to adore the Cross, because 'tis superstitious. Selden, Table-Talk, p. 106.

The Easterns appear to have a superstitious dislike to rebuilding upon the site of a former town. O'Donovan, Merv, xx.

3t. Over-exact; scrupulous beyond need, as from credulous fear.

Shall squeamish He my Pleasures harvest by Fond superstitious coyness thus prevent?

J. Beaumont, Psyche, i. 223.

4t. Idolatrously devoted.

Have I with all my full affections
Still met the king? loved him next heaven? obey'd him?
Been out of fondness superstitious to him?

Shak., Hen. VIII., iii. 1. 131.

Superstitious uses. See use.

Superstitiously (sū'pér-stish'us-li), adv. In a superstitious manner; with superstition.

superstitiousness (sū'pér-stish'us-ness), n. The state or character of being superstitious; superstition.

superstrain (sū'pér-strān'), v. t. To overstrain, or stretch unduly. [Rare.]

In the straining of a string, the further it is strained the less superstraining goeth to a note. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 182.

superstratum (sū'pér-strā'tum), n. pl. superstrata (-tā). [< L. superstratum, neut. of superstratus, pp. of supersternere, spread above, < super, above, + sternere, spread; see stratum.] A stratum or layer above another, or resting on something else.

The superstratum which will overlay us.

Byron, Don Juan, ix. 37.

superstruct (sū'pér-strukt'), v. t. [< L. superstructus, pp. of superstruere, build upon or over, < super, above, + struere, build; see structure.] To build or erect upon something. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), 11. 35.

superstruction (sū'pér-strukt'shən), n. [< superstruct + -ion.] 1. The act of erecting or building upon something.—2. A superstructure.

My own profession hath taught me not to erect new superstructions upon an old ruin. Sir J. Denham.

superstructive (sū'pér-strukt'iv), a. [< superstruct + -ive.] Built or erected on something else.

Nothing but the removing his fundamental error can rescue him from the superstructive, he it never so gross. Hammond.

superstructor (sū'pér-strukt'or), n. [< superstruct + -or.] One who builds on something else.

Was Oates's narrative a foundation or a superstructure, or was he one of the superstructors or not? Roger North, Examen, p. 193. (Davies.)

superstructural (sū'pér-strukt'ūr-al), a. [< superstructure + -al.] Of or pertaining to a superstructure.

superstructure (sū'pér-strukt'ūr), n. [< superstruct + -ure.] 1. Any structure built on something else; particularly, an edifice in relation to its foundation.

I am not for adding to the beautiful edifice of nature, nor for raising any whimsical superstructure upon her plans. Addison, Spectator, No. 98.

2. Hence, anything erected on a foundation or basis.

There is another kind of pedant, who, with all Tom Folio's impertinencies, hath greater superstructures and embellishments of Greek and Latin. Addison, Tatler, No. 158.

3. In railway engine, the sleepers, rails, and fastenings of a railway, in contradistinction to road-bed.

supersubstantial (sū'pér-sub-stan'shal), a. [< L. supersubstantialis, se. panis, an imperfect translation of Gr. ἐπιπαιος, se. ἄριστος, bread 'sufficient for the day' or bread 'for the coming day' ('daily bread'), or bread 'necessary to support life' (Mat. vi. 11), < L. super, upon, + substantia (tr. Gr. οὐσία), being, substance; see substance, substantial.] 1. More than substantial; beyond the domain of matter; being more than (material) substance; used with special reference to Mat. vi. 11, where the Greek ἐπιπαιος ('daily' in the authorized version) is in the Vulgate supersubstantialis.

This is the daily bread, the heavenly supersubstantial bread, by which our souls are nourished to life eternal. Jer. Taylor, Worthy Communicant, v. § 4.

2. [Tr. Gr. ὑπερπαιος.] Superessential; transcending all natures, all ideas, and the distinction of existence and non-existence.

supersubtilized (sū'pér-sut'il-īzd), a. Subtilized or refined to excess.

Wire-drawn sentiment and supersubtilized conceit.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 245.

supersubtle (sū'pér-sut'il), a. Over-subtle; cunning; crafty in an excessive degree. Shak., Othello, i. 3. 363.

supersubtlety (sū'pér-sut'il-ti), n. Excessive subtlety; over-nicety of discrimination.

The supersubtleties of interpretation to which our Teutonic cousins, who have taught us so much, are certainly somewhat prone. Lowell, Don Quixote.

supersurface (sū'pér-sēr'fās), n. A three-dimensional continuum in five-dimensional space.

supersust (sū'pér'sus), n. In music, an unusually high treble voice or voice-part.

supertelluric (sū'pér-te-lū'rik), a. Situated above the earth and its atmosphere.

supertemporal (sū'pér-tem'pō-ral), a. and n. I. a. Transcending time, or independent of time.

II. n. That which transcends or is independent of time.

Plotinus and Nomenius, explaining Plato's sense, declare him to have asserted three supertemporals or eternal, good, mind or intellect, and the soul of the universe. Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 625.

supertemporal (sū'pér-tem'pō-ral), a. In anat., situated above or high up in the temporal region; specifically noting certain lateral cerebral gyri and sulci.

superterrene (sū'pér-te-rēn'), a. [< L. superterrenus, above the earth, < L. super, over, + terra, earth; see terrene.] Being above ground or above the earth; superterrestrial.

superterrestrial (sū'pér-te-rēs'tri-āl), a. Situated above the world; not of the earth, but superior to it; supermundane; superterrene. Also supraterrestrial.

supertonic (sū'pér-ton-ik), n. In music, the tone in a scale next above the tonic or keynote; the second, as A in the scale of G.

supertragical (sū'pér-traj'ik-al), a. Tragical to excess.

supertripartient (sū'pér-trī-pār'ti-ent), a. In the ratio of 7 to 4.

supertriquartal (sū'pér-trī-kwōr'tal), a. Same as supertripartient.

supertuberation (sū'pér-tū-bē-rā'shən), n. The production of young tubers, as potatoes, from the old ones while still growing.

supertunic (sū'pér-tū-nik), n. Any garment worn immediately over a tunic; used loosely in the many cases where it is impossible to name more precisely garments so represented, as in ancient costume.

supervacaneous (sū'pér-vā-kā'nē-us), a. [= Sp. supervacúneo = It. supervacuó, < L. supervacuus, above what is necessary, needless, superfluous, < super, above, + vacuus, empty, void; see vacuous.] Superfluous; unnecessary; needless; serving no purpose.

I held it not altogether supervacaneous to take a review of them. Hovell, Letters, ii. 60.

supervacaneously (sū'pér-vā-kā'nē-us-li), adv. In a superfluous manner; needlessly. Imp. Dict.

supervacaneousness (sū'pér-vā-kā'nē-us-ness), n. Needlessness; superfluousness. Bailey.

supervacuous (sū'pér-vak'ū-us), a. [< L. supervacuus, needless, superfluous, < super, over, + vacuus, empty, void; see vacuous.] Being more than is necessary; supererogatory.

The Pope having the key, he may dispense the supervacuous duties of others (who do more than is required for their salvation) to sinners who have no merit of their own. Erclyn, True Religion, 11. 255.

supervene (sū'pér-vēn'), v. i.; and pp. supervened, ppr. supervening. [= F. survenir = Sp. supervénir, sobrevénir = Pg. sobrevir = It. supervenire, sopravvenire, < L. supervenire, come over or upon, overtake, < super, above, + venire, come: see come.] To come in as extraneous upon something; be added or joined; follow in close conjunction.

The dawning of the day is not materially turned into the greater light at noon; but a greater light superventeth. Baxter, Saints' Rest, iv., To the Reader.

The tall candles sank into nothingness; their flames went out utterly; the blackness of darkness supervened. Poe, Tales, I, 311.

supervenient (sū-pēr-vē'nient), a. [= Sp. Pg. superveniente, < L. supervenire (t)-s, pp. of supervenire, come upon: see supervene.] Coming in upon something as additional or extraneous; superadventitious; added; additional; following in close conjunction.

That branch of belief was in him supervenient to Christian practice. Hammond.

supervention (sū-pēr-ven'shon), n. [= Sp. supervención = Pg. supervenção, < L. supervenire (t)-s, a coming up, < L. supervenire, come upon: see supervene.] The act, state, or condition of supervening.

The grave symptoms . . . were undoubtedly caused by the supervention of blood poison, originating from the wound. J. M. Carnochan, Operative Surgery, p. 142.

supervisal (sū-pēr-vī'zal), n. [< supervise + -al.] The act of supervising; overseeing; inspection; superintendence.

Gilders, carvers, upholsterers, and picture-cleaners are labouring at their several forges, and I do not love to trust a hammer or a brush without my own supervisal. Walpole, To George Montagu, July 1, 1763.

supervise (sū-pēr-vī'z'), v. t.; pret. and pp. supervised, pp. supervising. [< ML. supervisare, pp. of supervidere, oversee, < L. super, over, + videre, pp. visus, see: see vision.] 1. To oversee; have charge of, with authority to direct or regulate; as, to supervise the erection of a house. The word often implies a more general care, with less attention to and direction of details, than superintend.

The small time I supervised the Glass-house, I got among those Venetians some Smatterings of the Italian Tongue. Howell, Letters, I, i, 3.

2†. To look over so as to peruse; read; read over.

You find not the apostrophas, and so miss the accent: let me supervise the canonet. Shak., L. L. L., iv, 2, 124. = Syn. 1. See list under superintend.

supervise† (sū-pēr-vī'z'), n. [< supervise, v.] Inspection.—On the supervise, at sight; on the first reading.

Importing Denmark's health and England's too, With, ho! such bugs and goblins in my life That, on the supervise, no leisure bated. Shak., Hamlet, v, 2, 23.

supervision (sū-pēr-vī'zh'on), n. [< ML. supervisio* (n)-, < supervidere, pp. supervisus, oversee: see supervise.] The act of supervising or overseeing; oversight; superintendence; direction: as, to have the supervision of a coal-mine; police supervision. = Syn. See list under superintendence.

supervisor (sū-pēr-vī'zor), n. [< ME. supervisor, < ML. supervisor, < supervidere, pp. supervisus, supervise: see supervise.] 1. One who supervises; an overseer; an inspector; a superintendent: as, the supervisor of a coal-mine; a supervisor of the customs or of the excise.

I desire and pray you . . . make a substantial bill in my name upon the said mater, . . . the said bill to be put up to the King, which is chief supervisor of my said Lord's testament, and to the Lord's Spirituelle and Temporelle, as to the Comyns, of this present Parlement, so as the iij. astates may graunte and passe hem clearly. Paston Letters, I, 372.

Your English gangers and supervisors that you have sent down benorth the Tweed have ta'en up the trade of thievery. Scott, Rob Roy, iv.

The twelve Supervisors of Estates [at Ludlow] are elected in the same manner [by the thirty-seven, or common council at large]. . . Their business is to attend to the letting and management of the corporation estates. Municip. Corp. Report (1835), p. 2790.

2†. A spectator; a looker-on.

Would you, the supervisor, grossly gape on? Shak., Othello, iii, 3, 395.

3†. One who reads over, as for correction.

The author and supervisors of this pamphlet. Dryden.

4. In some of the United States, an elected officer of a township or town having principal charge of its administrative business. The affairs of a township are managed in some States by a board of supervisors, in some by a single supervisor; in the latter case, the supervisor of the town is only one of a number of town officers, but his concurrent action with one or more of the others is often required, and the supervisors of all the townships in a county constitute together the county board, charged with the administrative business of the county.

Where there are several supervisors or trustees in the township, it is common to associate them together as a Board, and under such an arrangement they very closely resemble the New England board of selectmen in their administrative functions. W. Wilson, State, § 194.

supervisorship (sū-pēr-vī'zōr-shīp), n. [< supervisor + -ship.] The office of a supervisor.

supervisory (sū-pēr-vī'zō-rī), a. [< supervise + -ory.] Pertaining to or having supervision.

The Senate, in addition to its legislative, is vested also with supervisory powers in respect to treaties and appointments. Cathoun, Works, I, 159.

supervisual (sū-pēr-vī'zū-āl), a. [< L. super, over, + visus, seeing, sight: see visual.] Exceeding the ordinary visual powers.

Such an abnormally acute supervisual perception is by no means impossible. The Academy, July 12, 1890, p. 28.

supervivet† (sū-pēr-vīv'), v. t. [< ME. supervivere, < L. supervivere, live beyond, outlive, < super, over, + vivere, live: see virid. (cf. survive.)] To live beyond; outlive; survive. Lydgate, Minor Poems. [Rare.]

supervolute (sū-pēr-vō-lūt), a. [< L. supervolutus, pp. of supervolvere, roll over, < L. super, above, + volvere, roll, turn about.] In bot., noting a form of estivation in which the plaits of a gamopetalous corolla successively overlap one another, as in the morning-glory, jimson-weed, etc.; same as convolute except that the latter refers to petals instead of plaits; also, of a leaf, same as convolute.

supervolutive (sū-pēr-vō-lū'tiv), a. [< supervolute + -ive.] In bot., noting an estivation in which the plaits of a corolla or a vernation in which the leaves are supervolute. [Rare.]

supinate (sū-pī-nāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. supinated, pp. supinating. [< L. supinatus, pp. of supinare, bend or lay backward or on the back, < supinus, lying on the back: see supine.] In anat. and physiol., to bring (the hand) palm upward. In this position the radius and ulna are parallel. See prone.

The hand was pronated, and could not be supinated beyond the midway position. Lancet, 1890, I, 464.

supination (sū-pī-nā'shon), n. [= F. supination = Sp. supinación = It. supinazione, < L. supinatio (n)-, < supinare, bend or lay backward or on the back: see supinate.] 1. The act of lying or the state of being laid on the back, or face upward.—2. In anat. and physiol.: (a) A movement of the forearm and hand of man and some other animals which brings the palm of the hand uppermost and the radius and ulna parallel with each other, instead of crossing each other as in the opposite movement of pronation. (b) The position of the forearm and hand in which the ulna and radius lie parallel, not crossed, and the hand lies flat on its back, palm upward: the opposite of pronation. The act is accomplished and the position is assumed by means of the supinators, aided by the biceps.—3. In fencing, the position of the wrist when the palm of the hand is turned upward. Rolando (ed. Forsyth).

supinator (sū-pī-nā-tor), n.; pl. supinators (sū-pī-nā-tō'rēz) or supinators (sū-pī-nā-tōr-z). [NL., < L. supinare, pp. supinatus, bend or lay backward: see supinate.] A muscle which supinates the forearm: opposed to pronator: as, the biceps is a powerful supinator of the forearm.—Supinator brevis, a muscle at the proximal end of the forearm. It arises from the ulna and lateral ligaments of the elbow, and is wrapped around the radius and inserted upon its outer side.—Supinator longus, a flexor and supinator muscle of the forearm, lying superficially along the radial side of the forearm. It arises chiefly from the external supracondylar ridge of the humerus, and is inserted into the styloid process of the radius. Also called brachioradialis. See cut under muscle.—Supinator radii brevis. Same as supinator brevis.—Supinator radii longus. Same as supinator longus.—Supinator ridge of the humerus, the ectocondylar ridge, a ridge running up from the outer condyle, giving attachment to the supinator longus and other muscles.

supine, a. and n. [= Sp. Pg. It. supino, < L. supinus, turned or thrown backward, lying on the back, prostrate, also going backward, retrograde, going downward, sloping, inclined; figuratively, inactive, negligent, careless, indolent; neut. supinum, sc. verbum, applied in LL. to the verbal noun in -tū, -tū (the supine), and also to the verbal form in -ndum (the gerund), lit. 'the absolute verb'—that is, a verbal form without distinctions of voice, number, person, and tense—supinum, lit. 'inactive', hence neutral, absolute, translating Gr. θητικός as applied to the verbal form in -σθαι, called ἐπίπληκτα θητικός, lit. Swift, To Dr. Sheridan, June 29, 1725.

suppose (su-pōz'), v. pret. and pp. supposed, pp. supposing. [*< ME. supposen, suposen, < OF. supposer, F. supposer, taking the place of suppondre = Sp. suponer = Pg. supor = It. supponere, supporre, < L. supponere, subponere, pp. suppositus, subpositus, put under, substitute, esp. substitute by fraud, subjoin, annex, also subject, L.L. place as a pledge, hypothecate, in M.L. suppose, < sub, under, + ponere, set, place, put: see suppone and pose.] I. trans. 1. To infer hypothetically; conceive a state of things, and dwell upon the idea (at least for a moment) with an inclination to believe it true, due to the agreement of its consequences with observed fact, but not free from doubt.

Let it not be supposed that principles and opinions always go together, any more than sons are always like their parents. Gladstone, Might of Right, p. 184.

2. To make a hypothesis; formulate a proposition without reference to its being true or false, with a view of tracing out its consequences. To suppose in this sense is not to imagine merely, since it is an act of abstract thought, and many things can be supposed (as the imaginary points of the geometricians) which cannot be imagined; indeed, anything can be supposed to which we can attach a definite meaning—that is, which we can imagine in every feature to become a matter of practical interest—and which involves no contradiction. Moreover, to suppose is to set up a proposition in order to trace its consequences, while imagining involves no such ulterior purpose.

More rancorous spite, more furious raging broils,
Than yet can be imagined or supposed.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iv. 1. 186.

Go, and with drawn cutlashes stand at the stair-foot, and keep all that ask for me from coming up; suppose you were guarding the Scuttle to the Powder-Room.

Wycherley, Plain Dealer, I. 1.

When we have as great assurance that a thing is as we could possibly [have] supposing it were, we ought not to doubt of its existence. Tillotson.

3. To assume as true without reflection; presume; opine; believe.

The kyng answered all in laughinge, as that supposed well it was Merlin.

Merlin (E. E. T. S.), III. 623.

Let not my lord suppose that they have slain all the young men, the king's sons; for Amnon only is dead.

2 Sam. xiii. 32.

4. To imply; involve as a further proposition or consequence; proceed from, as from a hypothesis.

The system of living contrived by me was unreasonable and unjust, because it supposed a perpetuity of youth, health, and vigour.

Swift, Gulliver's Travels, III. 10.

This supposeth something without evident ground.

Sir M. Hale.

5†. To put, as one thing by fraud in the place of another.—Syn. 3. Expect, Suppose (see expect, v. t.), conclude, judge, apprehend.

II. intrans. To make or form a supposition; think; imagine.

To that contrie I rede we take the waye,
for ther we may not fayle of good service,
As ye suppose, tell me what ye seye.

Genevieve (E. E. T. S.), I. 627.

For these are not drunken, as ye suppose. Acts II. 15.

suppose (su-pōz'), n. [< suppose, v.] Supposition; presumption; conjecture; opinion.

Nor, princes, is it matter new to us
That we come short of our suppose so far

That after seven years' siege yet Troy walls stand.

Shak., T. and C., I. 3. 11.

Those confounded Moussul merchants! Their supposes always come to pass.

Maryat, Pacha of Many Tales, The Water-Carrier.

supposed (su-pōzd'), p. a. Regarded or received as true; imagined; believed.

Much was said about the supposed vacancy of the throne by the abdication of James. Lecky, Eng. in 15th Cent., I.

Supposed bass, in music. See bass.

supposedly (su-pō'zed-li), adv. As may be supposed; by supposition; presumably.

A triumphal arch, supposedly of the period of Marcus Aurelius.

H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 232.

supposer (su-pōz'ēr), n. [< suppose + -er.] One who supposes.

supposita (su-pōz'i-tā), n. pl. [L., pl. of suppositum: see suppositum, suppositus.] In logic, same as extension, 5.

suppositivity, n. [*< supposital (< suppose + -al) + -ity.] See the quotation.

Hence there can be no difficulty in the meaning of the word Suppositivity, which is the Abstract of the Suppositum.

John Sergeant, Solid Philosophy (1679), p. 99.

[quoted by F. Hall.]

suppositary, a. [< supposit + -ary.] Suppositional.

Whether (in any art or science whatsoever) a bare Hypothesis, or sole suppositary argument, may not be gratis, and with the same facility and authority be denied as it is affirmed.

John Gaule, The Magastro-mancer, or the Magical Astrological Diviner Posed and Puzzled (1652), p. 107, [quoted by F. Hall.]

suppositate, v. t. [< supposit + -ate.] To enter by substitution; enter. [Rare.]

Witness, for instance sake, those queries, whither God be materia prima, and whither Christs divinitie might not suppositate a fly.

John Boughtly, A Discourse, etc. (1628), p. 12, quoted by [F. Hall.]

suppositative (su-pōz'i-tā-tiv), a. [< suppositate + -ive.] Suppositional; hypothetical. [Rare.]

suppositer (su-pōz'it), a. and n. [< L. suppositus, subpositus, pp. of supponere, subponere, put under, substitute: see suppose.] The quotations credited to F. Hall as exemplifying this and the cognate words are taken from the "New York Nation," August 23d, 1888.] I. a. 1. Placed under or opposite.

The people through the whole world of Antipodes,
In outward feature, language, and religion,
Resemble those to whom they are supposite.

Brown, The Antipodes, I. 6.

2. Supposed; imagined.

What he brings of the supposite and imaginary causes of Paul, Barnabas, and Peter, proves . . . Vindicated (1855)

Robert Bailie, The Disswaver, I. 1, quoted by F. Hall.

II. n. 1. A person or thing supposed.

Passions, as Actions, are of Persons or Supposites.

Richard Burthogge, Causa Dei (1675), p. 55, quoted by [F. Hall.]

2. The subject of a verb.

We inquire of that we had know: as, made God man without synne; and in this the supposit of the verb follows the verb. A. Hume, Orthographie (E. E. T. S.), p. 90.

[Rare in all uses.]

supposite (su-pōz'it), v. t. [< L. suppositus, subpositus, put under, substitute: see suppositus, a.] To substitute.

According to Ockham, the external object—for all science was of singulars—was included in the name being supposed as its verbal equivalent.

J. Owen, Evenings with Skeptics, II. 365.

supposition (sup-ō-zish'on), n. [< F. supposition = Sp. suposición = Pg. suposição = It. supposizione, supposition, < L. suppositio(n-), subpositio(n-), a putting under, substitution, in M.L. also supposition, < supponere, subponere, put under, substitute: see suppose.] 1. The act and mental result of hypothetical inference; that act of mind by which a likelihood is admitted in a proposition on account of the truth of its consequences; a presumption.

We reasoned throughout our article on the supposition that the end of government was to produce the greatest happiness to mankind.

Macaulay, West, Reviewer's Def. of Mill.

2. The act and mental result of formulating a proposition, without reference to its truth or falsity, for the sake of tracing out its consequences; a hypothesis.

Spread o'er the silver waves thy golden hairs,
And as a bed I'll take them and there lie,
And in that glorious supposition think
He gains by death that hath such means to die.

Shak., C. of E., III. 2. 50.

3. In logic, the way in which a name is to be understood in a given proposition, in reference to its standing for an object of this or that class. Thus, in the sentences "man is a biped," "man has turned rivers and cut through mountains," "man is a class name," the substantive name man has the same signification but different suppositions. The signification is said to be the same, because the variations of meaning are merely the regular variations to which names are generally subject; and these general modes of variation of meaning are called suppositions.

4†. Substitution.

I believe I am not blameable for making this supposition [of my sonnet]. Ariana (1636), p. 203, quoted by F. Hall.

Material, personal, etc., supposition. See the adjectives.—Rule of supposition. See rule.

suppositional (sup-ō-zish'on-āl), a. [< supposition + -al.] Based on supposition; supposed; hypothetical; conjectural.

Men and angels . . . have . . . a certain knowledge of them [future things]; but it is not absolute, but only suppositional.

South, Sermons, IX. xi.

suppositionally (sup-ō-zish'on-āl-i), adv. By way of supposition; hypothetically.

suppositionaly (sup-ō-zish'on-ā-rī), n. [< supposition + -ary.] Supposed; hypothetical. [Rare.]

Consider yourself as yet more beloved by me for the manner in which you have reproved my suppositional errors.

Shelley, in Bowdler, I. 252.

suppositionless (sup-ō-zish'on-less), a. [< supposition + -less.] Not subject to any special conditions; not having any peculiar general characters.—Suppositionless function. See function.

suppositious, a. Same as supposititious.

supposititious (su-pōz'i-tish'us), a. [= Sp. supositicio = Pg. supositicio = It. suppositizio, < L. suppositus, subpositus, put in place of another, substituted, esp. by fraud, spurious, < supponere, subponere, pp. suppositus, subpositus, put under, substitute: see suppose.] 1. Put by artifice in the place of or assuming the character of another; not genuine; counterfeit; spurious.

Queen Philippa, Wife of King Edward the Third, upon her deathbed, by way of Confession, told Wickham that John of Gaunt was not the lawful issue of King Edward, but a supposititious son. Baker, Chronicles, p. 167.

About P. Gelasius's time there was a world of supposititious writings vended and received by the heretics. Evelyn, True Religion, l. 403.

2. Hypothetical; supposed. [Rare.]

The supposititious Unknowable, when exposed to the relentless alchemy of reason, vanishes into the merest vapors of abstraction, and "leaves not a rack behind." Jour. Spec. Phil., XIX. 35.

Spirifer disjunctus, . . . highly prized on account of its supposititious medicinal virtues. Nature, XXX. 153.

=Syn. 1. Counterfeit, etc. See spurious.

supposititiously (su-poz-i-tish'us-li), adv. 1. In a supposititious manner; spuriously. [Rare.] 2. Hypothetically; by way of supposition. [Rare.]

Supposititiously he derives it from the Lame Montes 15 degrees south. Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 31.

supposititiousness (su-poz-i-tish'us-nes), n. The character of being supposititious. Bailey.

suppositive (su-poz-i-tiv), a. and n. [L. suppositus, pp. of supponere, put under, substitute; see suppose.] 1. a. Supposed; including or implying supposition.

By a suppositive intimation and by an express prediction. Bp. Pearson, Expos. of Creed, iv.

Suppositive notion, an abstract or symbolical notion; a notion not intuitive.

II. n. A conditional or continuative conjunction, as if, granted, provided.

The suppositives denote connexion, but assert not actual existence. Harris, Hermes, ii. 2.

suppositively (su-poz-i-tiv-i), adv. By or upon supposition.

The unreformed sinner may have some hope suppositively, if he do change and repent; the honest penitent may hope positively. Hammond.

suppositor (su-poz-i-tor), n. [ML. suppositorium, that which is put under; see suppository.] A suppository; hence, an aid.

Now amorous, then scurvy, sometimes bawdy; The same man still, but evermore fantastical, As being the suppositor to laughter; It hath sav'd charge in physic. Ford, Fancies, iii. 1.

suppository (su-poz-i-tō-rī), n.; pl. suppositorias (-riz). [= F. suppositoire = Sp. suppositorio = It. suppositorio, < LL. suppositorium, a suppository, neut. of suppositorius, that is placed underneath, < L. supponere, pp. supponitus, put under; see suppose.] In med.: (a) A medicinal substance in the form of a cone or cylinder, introduced into the rectum, vagina, or uterus, there to remain and dissolve gradually in order to procure certain specific effects. (b) A plug to hold back hemorrhoidal protrusions.

suppositum, n. [NL. neut. of L. suppositus, subpositus, put under, substitute; see suppose. Cf. supposita.] That which is supposed; the thing denoted by a name in a given proposition. See the quotation under suppositivity.

supposure (su-pō-zūr), n. [< suppose + -ure.] Supposition; hypothesis. [Rare.]

Thy other arguments are all Supposures, hypothetical. S. Butler, Hudibras, l. iii. 1322.

suppress (su-pres'), v. t. [< ME. "suppressen" (in pp. suppressere), < L. suppressus, suppressus, pp. of suppressere, subprimere (> It. comprimere = F. comprimer) = Sp. suprimir = Pg. suprimir, press down or under, keep back, conceal, suppress, < sub, under, + primere, press; see press.] 1. To overpower; subdue; put down; quell; crush; stamp out.

The ancients afford us two examples for suppressing the impertinent curiosity of mankind in diving into secrets. Bacon, Political Fables, i.

Every rebellion, when it is suppressed, doth make the subject weaker and the government stronger. Sir J. Davies, State of Ireland.

The Number of Monasteries suppressed were six hundred forty-five. Baker, Chronicles, p. 246.

I have never suppressed any man; never checked him for a moment in his course by any jealousy, or any policy. Burke, Letter to a Noble Lord.

Conscience pleads her cause within the breast, Though long rebell'd against, not yet suppressed. Cowper, Retirement, l. 16.

2. To restrain from utterance or vent; keep in; repress; as, to suppress a groan.

Well didst thou, Richard, to suppress thy voice, Shak., I Hen. VI., iv. 1. 182.

Resolv'd with one consent To give such act and utterance as they may To ecstasy too big to be suppressed. Cowper, Task, vi. 340.

3. To withhold from disclosure; conceal; refuse or forbear to reveal; withhold from publication; withdraw from circulation, or prohibit circulation of; as, to suppress evidence; to suppress a letter; to suppress an article or a poem.

In vain an author would a name suppress; From the least hint a reader learns to guess. Crabbe, Works, V. 162.

What is told in the fullest and most accurate annals bears an infinitely small proportion to that which is suppressed. Macaulay, History.

There was something unusually doughty in this refusal of Mr. Lloyd to obey the behests of the government, and to suppress his paper, rather than acknowledge himself in the wrong. F. Martin, Hist. Lloyd's, p. 76.

4. To hinder from passage or circulation; stop; stifle; smother.

Down sunk the priest: the purple hand of death Clos'd his dim eye, and fate suppress'd his breath. Pope, Iliad, v. 169.

5. To stop by remedial means; check; restrain; as, to suppress a diarrhea or a hemorrhage.

suppressed (su-pres'), a. [< ME. "suppressed", suppressid; < suppress + -ed.] 1. Restrained; repressed; concealed.

A suppressed resolve will betray itself in the eyes. George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, vi. 14.

2. Oppressed.

God's law biddeth help the suppressed, jugth to the fadrires, defendith the wyddow. Apology for the Lollards, p. 79. (Hallivell.)

3. In her., debriused; as, a lion-suppressed by a bend.

suppressedly (su-pres'ed-li), adv. In a suppressed or restrained manner.

They both laugh low and suppressedly. R. Browning, Second Thoughts, ii. 4.

suppressor (su-pres'er), n. [< suppress + -er.] One who suppresses; a suppressor.

suppressible (su-pres'i-bl), a. [< suppress + -ible.] Capable of being suppressed, concealed, or restrained.

suppression (su-pres'hon), n. [< F. suppression = Sp. supresion = Pg. supressão = It. suppressione, < L. suppressio(n-), subpressio(n-), a pressing down, a keeping back, suppression, < suppressere, subprimere, press down, suppress; see suppress.] 1. The act of suppressing, crushing, or quelling, or the state of being suppressed, crushed, quelled, or the like; as, the suppression of a riot, insurrection, or tumult.

A magnificent "Society for the Suppression of Vice." Cardle, Werner.

2. The act of concealing or withholding from utterance, disclosure, revelation, or publication; as, the suppression of truth, of evidence, or of reports.

Dr. Middleton . . . resorted to the most disingenuous shifts, to unpardonable distortions and suppression of facts. Macaulay, Lord Bacon.

The unknown amount of painful suppression that a cautious thinker, a careful writer, or an artist of fine taste has gone through represents a great physico-mental expenditure. A. Bain, in Stewart's Conserv. of Energy, p. 234.

3. The stoppage or obstruction or the morbid retention of discharges; as, the suppression of a diarrhea, of saliva, or of urine.—4. In bot., the absence, as in flowers, of parts requisite to theoretical completeness; abortion.

suppressionist (su-pres'hon-ist), n. [< suppression + -ist.] One who supports or advocates suppression.

suppressio veri (su-pres'hō vē-rī), [L. suppressio, suppression; veri, gen. of verum, the truth, neut. of verus, true; see ware.] Suppression of truth; in law, an undue concealment or non-disclosure of facts and circumstances which one party is under a legal or equitable obligation to communicate, and which the other party has a right—not merely in conscience, but juris et de jure—to know. Minor. Compare suggestio falsi.

suppressive (su-pres'iv), a. [< suppress + -ive.] Tending to suppress.

Johnson gives us expressive and oppressive, but neither impressive nor suppressive, though proceeding as obviously from their respective sources. Seward, Letters, ii.

suppressor (su-pres'or), n. [< L. suppressor, suppressor, a hider, concealer, < suppressere, subprimere, suppress; see suppress.] One who suppresses, crushes, or quells; one who represses, checks, or stifles; one who conceals. M. Thompson, Story of Louisiana.

suppurate (sup'ū-rāt), v.; pret. and pp. suppurated, ppr. suppurating. [< L. suppuratus, subpuratus, pp. of suppurare, subpurare, form pus, gather matter; see suppure.] 1. intrans. To produce pus; as, a wound suppurates.

II. trans. To produce (pus). [Rare.]

This disease is generally fatal: if it suppurates the pus, it is evacuated into the lower belly, where it produeth putrefaction. Arbuthnot, Diet.

suppuration (sup'ū-rā'shon), n. [< F. suppuration = Sp. supuración = Pg. supuração = It. suppurazione, < L. suppuratio(n-), subpuratio(n-), a suppurating, < suppurare, subpurare, suppurate; see suppure.] 1. Formation of pus.—2. The matter produced by suppuration; pus; as, the suppuration was abundant.

suppurative (sup'ū-rā-tiv), a. and n. [< F. suppuratif = Sp. supurativo = Pg. It. suppurativo; as suppurate + -ive.] I. a. Producing pus.

In different cases, inflammation will bear to be called adhesive, or serous, or hemorrhagic, or suppurative. Dr. P. M. Latham, Lects. on Clin. Med.

II. n. A medicine that promotes suppuration.

If the inflammation be gone too far towards a suppuration, then it must be promoted with suppuratives, and opened by incision. Wiseman.

suppurer, v. i. [< OF. suppurer = Sp. supurar = It. suppurare, < L. suppurare, subpurare, form pus, gather matter, < sub, under, + pus (pur-), pus; see pus.] To suppurate. Colgrave.

supputate, v. t. [< L. supputatus, subputatus, pp. of supputare, subputare (> It. supputare = Pg. supputar = Sp. suputar = F. supputer), count up, reckon; see suppute.] To reckon; compute; as, to supputate time or distance. A. Wood, Athenae Oxon., I.

supputation (sup'ū-tā'shon), n. [< F. supputation = Sp. suputación = Pg. supputação = It. supputazione, < L. supputatio(n-), subputatio(n-), a reckoning up, < supputare, subputare, reckon; see suppute.] A reckoning; account; computation.

Expert sea men affirm that every league conteyneth foure myles, after theyr supputations.

Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, ed. [Arber], p. 65).

I speak of a long time; it is above forty quarantains, or forty times forty nights, according to the supputation of the Ancient Druids. Urykurt, tr. of Kabeis, l. 1.

supputer (su-pūt'), v. t. [< L. supputare, subputare, compute, reckon, also cut off, lop, trim, < sub, under, + putare, reckon, think, cleanse, trim; see putation, and cf. compute, deputate, impute, repute.] To reckon; compute; impute.

That, in a learn'd war, the foe they would invade, And, like stout floods, stand free from this supputed shame. Dryden, Polyolbion, xxix. 363.

supra-. [< L. supra-, prefix, rare in L., but rather common in ML., < suprā, adv., orig. superā, adv. and prep., on the upper side, above, beyond, before, more than, besides; orig. contr. abl. fem. of superus, that is above, higher, < super = Gr. ἐπί, above, over; see super-.] A prefix of Latin origin, meaning 'above,' 'beyond.' It is used in the same way as super-, with which in terms of anatomy, zoology, botany, etc., it is interchangeable, but is somewhat more technical. It is opposed to infra-, and to sub-, subter, and hypo-. Recent technical words with supra- are in the following list left without further etymological note.

supra-acromial (sū-prā-a-kro'mi-āl), a. Same as supracromial.—Supra-acromial artery, a branch of the suprascapular artery, anastomosing with twigs of the acromiothoracic artery.—Supra-acromial nerve. See suprascapular nerve, under suprascapular.

supra-acromiohumeralis (sū-prā-a-kro'mi-ō-hū-me-rā'lis), n. The deltoid muscle.

supra-anal (sū-prā-ā-nal), a. In entom., placed above the tip of the abdomen, on the last abdominal segment seen from above. Also supra-anal, suranal.—Supra-anal groove, a transverse hollow on the last abdominal segment, just above the anal orifice, of many Hymenoptera.—Supra-anal lamina. Same as preanal segment (which see, under preanal).—Supra-anal tubercle or plate, a harder projecting part of the integument on the posterior extremity of a larva, especially of a caterpillar.

supra-angular (sū-prā-ang'gū-lār), a. Same as surangular.

supra-audicular (sū-prā-ā-rik'ū-lār), a. Situated over the auricle or external ear.—Supra-auricular point, in cranion., a point vertically over the auricular point at the root of the zygomatic process. See cut under craniometry.

supra-axillary (sū-prā-ak'si-lār-i), a. In bot., inserted above instead of in the axil, as a peduncle. Compare suprafoliaceous.

suprabranchial (sū-prā-brang'ki-āl), a. Situated over or above the gills, as of a fish or mollusk.

suprabuccal (sū-prā-buk'ū-āl), a. Situated over or above the buccal region, as of a mollusk.

supracephalic (sū-prā-se-fal'ik or -sef'ū-lik), a. Placed on (the top of) the head. Science, VII. 27. [Rare.]

supraciliary (sū-prā-sil'i-ā-ri), a. Same as superciliary, 3.

supraclavicle (sū-prā-klav'i-kl), n. In ichth., a superior bony element of the scapular arch of many fishes, which, like the elements called interclavicle and postclavicle, is variously homologized by different writers; the posterotemporal.

In bony fishes, where the clavicles become enormous, and may not only be provided with a distinct interclavicle, but also each with a distinct portion above—the supraclavicle—as in the Dory, . . . Sturgeon, and others, and besides this with a posterior element, a post clavicle, as in the Dory, Perch, and Cod. Micart, Elem. Anat., p. 162.

supraclavicular (sū-prā-klav'ik-lār), a. 1. In anat., situated over, above, or upon the clavicle. —2. In ichth., of or pertaining to the supraclavicle. —Supraclavicular fossa, the depression above the clavicle corresponding to the interval between the sternocleidomastoid and trapezius muscles. —Supraclavicular nerves, superficial descending branches of the cervical plexus, three or four in number, supplying the skin of the upper part of the breast and over the shoulder. The main branches are specified as sternal, clavicular, and acromial. Also respectively suprasternal, supraclavicular, and supra-acromial nerves. —Supraclavicular point, a point above the clavicle where electric stimulation will cause the deltoid, biceps, brachialis anticus, and supinator longus to contract. —Supraclavicular region, the triangular region on the front of the base of the neck, bounded below by the upper border of the clavicle, within by the outer border of the sternocleidomastoid, and without by a line drawn from the inner end of the outer fourth of the clavicle to that point on the outer border of the sternocleidomastoid which is opposite the first ring of the trachea.

supraclypeal (sū-prā-klip'ē-āl), a. In entom., situated above the clypeus; noting the supraclypeus. —Supraclypeal piece, the supraclypeus.

supraclypeus (sū-prā-klip'ē-us), n.; pl. supraclypeus (-i). [NL.] In entom., a subdivision of the clypeus of some insects, especially observable in Hymenoptera. See clypeus. Sometimes called postnasus.

supracondylar (sū-prā-kon'di-lār), a. Situated above the condyles, as of the femur, humerus, occipital bone, or lower jaw-bone. —Supracondylar eminence or protuberance, either the ectocondyle or the entocondyle of the humerus. See epicocondyle (with cut). —Supracondylar foramen. (a) The posterior condyloid foramen of the occipital bone. It is small and inconstant in man, in whom it transmits a vein to the lateral sinus, but is a large cavity of the occipital bone of some animals. (b) A well-marked and constant foramen in the inner condyloid ridge of the humerus of many mammals, through which pass the brachial artery and median nerve. It is occasionally found as an anomaly in man, or indicated by the supracondylar process (which see, under process). Also supracondyloid and supratrochlear foramen. —Supracondylar lines of the femur. See line 2. —Supracondylar process. See process, and cut under epicocondyle. —Supracondylar ridges, ridges on the shaft of the humerus which extend upward to a varying distance above the external and internal condyles.

supracondyloid (sū-prā-kon'di-loid), a. and n. I. a. Same as supracondylar.

II. n. The supracondylar process or foramen.

supracoralline (sū-prā-kor'ā-lin), a. Situated above coral. —Supracoralline beds, a series of grits and shales lying above the coral rag, and forming the uppermost division of the Coralline Oolite, a varied group lying between the Oxford and Kimmeridge clays as developed in various parts of England.

supracostal (sū-prā-kos'tal), a. Lying upon or above (cephalad of) the ribs: as, the supracostal muscles.

supracretaceous (sū-prā-krē-tā'shius), a. In geol., overlying the Cretaceous series, or more recent than that: noting rocks, including those of the Tertiary, Post-tertiary, and recent formations or groups. Also supercretaceous.

supradecompose (sū-prā-dē-kom-pound'), a. More than decompose; thrice or indefinitely compound: applied in botany to leaves and fronds.

supradorsal (sū-prā-dōr'sal), a. Situated on the back (of any organism); placed dorsally or dorsal: dorsal. Nature, XL, 172.

supra-entity (sū-prā-en'ti-ti), n. [< L. supra, above, + ML. entitas (-t)-s, entity: see entity.] A superessential being.

God is not only said to be An ens, but supraentitit.

Herriek, Upon God.

supra-esophageal (sū-prā-ē-sō-faj'ē-āl), a. Situated above (dorsad of) the gullet; lying over or upon the esophagus, as a nervous ganglion or commissure in an invertebrate. Also suprapharyngeal, supra-oesophageal, and rarely supra-esophagal, supra-oesophagal.

suprafoliaceus (sū-prā-fō-li-ā'shius), a. [< L. supra, above, + folium, a leaf, + -aceus.] In bot., inserted upon the stem above the axil of a leaf, as a peduncle or flower.

suprafoliar (sū-prā-fō-li-ār), a. [< L. supra, above, + folium, a leaf, + -ar.] In bot., growing upon a leaf. [Rare.]

supraglottic (sū-prā-glōt'ik), a. Situated above the true glottis, or relating to what is thus situated, referring to any part of the larynx above the true vocal cords. —Supraglottic aphonia, aphonia due to some affection of the parts above the glottis.

suprahyoid (sū-prā-hi'oid), a. In anat., situated above the hyoid bone; specifically applied to the submental or hyomental group of muscles: opposed to infrahyoid. —Suprahyoid aponeurosis, a fold of cervical fascia extending between the bellies of the digastric muscle, and forming a loop which binds the tendon of that muscle down to the hyoid bone. —Suprahyoid glands, one or two lymphatic glands in the neck between the anterior bellies of the digastric muscles, receiving lymphatics from the lower lip. —Suprahyoid region, that part of the front of the neck which lies above the hyoid bone. Also called submaxillary, submental, and hyomental region.

supra-iliac (sū-prā-il'i-āk), a. Situated upon the upper (proximal or sacral) end of the ilium; of the character of, or pertaining to, a supra-ilium.

supra-ilium (sū-prā-il'i-um), n. [NL.] A proximal (anterior or superior) epiphysis of the sacral end of the ilium of some animals.

supra-intestinal (sū-prā-in-tes'ti-nal), a. 1. Situated above the intestine: specifically noting, in certain annelids, as the earthworm, that one of the longitudinal trunks of the pseudocoelomic system which lies along the dorsal aspect of the alimentary canal. —2. In Mollusca, situated above (dorsad of) the alimentary canal: as, a supra-intestinal ganglion. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 348.

supralabial (sū-prā-lā'bi-āl), a. Of or pertaining to the upper lip; situated on or over the upper lip. —Supralabial elevator, the supralabialis.

supralabialis (sū-prā-lā'bi-ā'lis), n.; pl. supralabiales (-lēz). The proper levator muscle of the upper lip, usually called the levator labii superioris. See levator. Cuvier, 1887.

supralapsarian (sū-prā-lap-sā'ri-an), a. and n. [< supralapsary + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to supralapsarianism.

Supralapsarian scheme. C. Mather, Mag. Chris., iii, 1.

The supralapsarian scheme, which differs from the former (infralapsarian) in the order of the decrees, and, with a severer but terrible logic, includes the fall as a necessary negative condition for the manifestation of God's redeeming mercy on the elect, and his punitive justice on the reprobate, was held as a private opinion by some eminent Calvinists, . . . but it is not taught in any Confession.

P. Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 161.

II. n. One who believes in supralapsarianism.

supralapsarianism (sū-prā-lap-sā'ri-an-izm), n. [< supralapsarian + -ism.] The theological doctrine that God selected from men to be created certain ones to be redeemed and receive eternal life, and certain others to be appointed to eternal death, and that thus, in the order of thought, election and reprobation preceded creation: so called because it supposes that men before the fall are the objects of election to eternal life and foreordination to eternal death.

supralapsary (sū-prā-lap'sa-ri), n. and a. [< L. supra, before, + lapsus, fall (see lapsus), + -ary.] Supralapsarian. Imp. Dict.

supralateral (sū-prā-lat'ē-āl), a. In entom., placed on the upper part of the side; superior on the lateral surface: as, a supralateral line; used principally in describing larvae.

supraloral (sū-prā-lō'ral), a. and n. I. a. Lying over the lores of a bird: as, a supraloral color-mark.

II. n. A supraloral mark or formation.

supralunar (sū-prā-lū'nār), a. [< L. supra, above, + luna, the moon; see lunar.] Being beyond the moon; hence, very lofty; of very great height. Imp. Dict.

supramammary (sū-prā-mam'ā-ri), a. Lying above the mammae. —Supramammary abscess, an abscess in the subcutaneous tissue above the breast. —Supramammary region. Same as infracavicular region (which see, under infracavicular).

supramarginal (sū-prā-mār'jī-nal), a. Bordering the Sylvian fissure on the upper side: noting a convolution of the brain. Also supramarginal. Supramarginal convolution or gyrus, one of the parietal gyri. See gyrus (with cut).

supramaxilla (sū-prā-mak-sil'ā), n.; pl. supramaxillae (-i). [NL.] The supramaxillary.

supramaxillary (sū-prā-mak'sil-ā-ri), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the upper jaw, in part or as a whole; related to or connected with the superior maxillary bone. —Supramaxillary nerve. (a) The second or superior maxillary division of the fifth or trifacial nerve, a nerve of common sensation, chiefly distributed to the bones, teeth, and soft parts of the upper jaw. It leaves the cranial cavity by the foramen rotundum of the sphenoid. (b) One of several small motor branches of the facial nerve, distributed to muscles of the superior maxillary region.

II. n.; pl. supramaxillaries (-rīz). The superior maxillary, or upper jaw-bone, forming a part, in man nearly the whole, of the bony framework of the upper jaw, and representing more or less of the expanse of the cheek; correlated with inframaxillary. The part which the supramaxillary takes in the formation of the upper jaw mostly depends upon the relative size of the premaxillary (antimaxillary) bone. In man the latter is very small, occupying only a little space at the anterior-inferior corner of the supramaxillary, and is observable only in infancy, as it speedily ankyloses with the supramaxillary. The supramaxillary is in inverse ratio extensive, and also expansive or inflated, being entirely hollowed out by the maxillary sinus, or antrum of Highmore. It presents to the cheek an external or facial surface, with several elevations

m, three molars; pm, two premaxillae; c, canine; r, two incisors, rooted in alveolar border; an, anterior nasal spine; nn, nasal notch; np, nasal process; ar, orbital surface; ms, rough surface for articulation with malar bone; cs, canine surface; pd, two posterior dental canals; so, suborbital foramen; ic, incisive fossa; c, canine; pm, premaxilla. The small upper figure shows the palatal surface of the bone of the fetus. mx, the true supramaxillary, being still separated by a suture, s, from the premaxilla, pm, which will bear two molars.

and depressions marking the attachments of muscles, and just below the eye the large infra-orbital foramen. The posterior or zygomatic surface shows the openings of the posterior dental canals, and a rough surface for articulation with the palate bone. The superior or orbital surface forms most of the floor of the orbit of the eye. The internal or nasal surface forms much of the outer wall of the nasal meatus, and shows the opening of the antrum. Besides these surfaces, the bone has several well-marked processes, as the nasal, running up to the frontal bone, the malar, articulating with the bone of that name, the alveolar, bearing teeth, and the palatal, roofing part of the mouth. The two supramaxillary bones when together show in front a somewhat heart-shaped opening, the anterior nares, at the middle of the base of which is the prominent nasal spine, a landmark in craniometry. Each articulates with nine bones (sometimes ten), and to each twelve muscles are attached. (See cuts under skull, orbit, and palate.) In other mammals the supramaxillary has various shapes, and is comparatively smaller; it may always be recognized as the bone which bears the upper molar, premolar, and canine teeth—all the upper teeth excepting the incisors. In birds the supramaxillary is very greatly reduced, and often not distinctly defined; the palatal part of it is represented by a well-developed maxillopalatine; but nearly the whole of the upper beak of a bird, beyond the feathers, has for its bony basis the highly developed premaxillary. In the lower vertebrates the superior maxillary is presented under the most diverse conditions of size and shape, and is generally identified with the second bone from the front of those constituting the upper maxillary arch.

supramundane (sū-prā-mūn'dān), a. [< L. supra, above, + mundus, the world; see mundane.] In neoplatonic philos., belonging to the ideal and above the sensible world; belonging to the spiritual world; supernatural: opposed to immundane.

We dream of a realm of authoritative duty in which the earth is but a province of a supramundane moral empire. J. Martineau, Materialism, p. 62.

supranasal (sū-prā-nā'zal), a. Situated above the nose, or over the nasal bones. —Supranasal point. Same as ophryon.

supranatural (sū-prī-nat'ū-rāl), a. Supernatural. Science, IX, 174.

supranaturalism (sū-prī-nat'ū-rāl-izm), n. [< supranatural + -ism.] Same as supernaturalism.

supranaturalist (sū-prī-nat'ū-rāl-ist), a. and n. Same as supernaturalist. Schaff, Euseb, Rel. Knowl., III, 1908; G. Eliot, tr. of Strauss's Life of Jesus, Int., § 11.

supranaturalistic (sū-prī-nat'ū-rāl-ist'ik), a. [< supranaturalist + -ic.] Supernaturalistic. Euseb, Dict.

supraneural (sū-prī-nū-rāl), a. Situated over the neural axis or canal; neural or dorsal with reference to such axis. Geol. Mag., XLIV, 82.

supra-obliquus (sū prī-ob-lī'kwus), n.; pl. supra-obliqui (-kwī). The upper oblique or trochlear muscle of the eyeball, usually called the obliquus superior. Coues, 1887.

supra-occipital (sū prī-ok-sip'ī-tal), a. and n. Same as superoccipital. Amer. Nat., XXIII, 861.

supra-oesophageal, a. See supra-esophageal. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 191.

supra-orbital (sū-prī-ōr'bi-tal), a. and n. I. a. Situated over or upon the orbit of the eye; roofing over the eye-socket; superciliary. — Supra-orbital arch, the superciliary arch. — Supra-orbital artery, a branch of the ophthalmic artery which passes out of the orbit by the ophthalmic notch to supply the forehead. — Supra-orbital bone, a bone entering into the formation of the supra-orbital or superciliary arch. No such bone is found in man, and probably not in any mammal; but they frequently occur in the lower vertebrates, sometimes forming a chain of bones along the upper edge of the orbit. See cut under Lepidosiren. — Supra-orbital canal, the supra-orbital foramen extended into a canal. — Supra-orbital foramen, a foramen formed in some cases by the bridging over of the supra-orbital notch. It is situated at about the junction of the inner and middle thirds of the superior border of the orbit. It exists in few animals besides man, and is inconstant in him. — Supra-orbital gyrus. See cut under gyrus. — Supra-orbital nerve, the terminal branch of the frontal nerve, leaving the orbit by the supra-orbital notch or foramen, and distributed to the skin of the forehead and fore and upper parts of the scalp, furnishing sensory filaments to the muscles of this region. — Supra-orbital neuralgia, neuralgia of the supra-orbital branch of the frontal nerve, other branches of the first division of the trigeminal being more or less involved. — Supra-orbital notch. See notch. — Supra-orbital point, a tender point just above the supra-orbital notch or foramen, appearing in supra-orbital neuralgia. — Supra-orbital vein, a vein commencing on the forehead, and joining the frontal vein at the inner angle of the orbit to form the angular vein.

II. n. A supra-orbital artery or nerve.

supra-orbital, supra-orbitary (sū-prī-ōr'bi-tār, -tār), a. Same as supra-orbital.

suprapatellar (sū-prī-pat'e-lār), a. Situated above the patella.

suprapedal (sū-prī-ped'al), a. [< L. supra, above, + pes (ped-) = E. foot; see pedal.] Situated above the foot or podium of a mollusk; specifically noting a gland or a ganglion.

suprapharyngeal (sū-prī-fā-rin'jē-āl), a. Same as supra-esophageal.

There is but one buccal ganglion in the Dibranchiata, and behind it there is a large supra-pharyngeal ganglion. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 351.

supraplex (sū-prī-pleks), n. One of the plexuses of the brain of some animals, as dipnoans. B. G. Wilder. [Recent.]

supraplexal (sū-prī-plek'sal), a. Pertaining to the supraplex.

supraposition (sū-prī-pō-zish'on), n. [< ML. suppositio(n), used in the sense of 'an extraordinary tax,' lit. a placing above, < L. supra, above, + positio(n), a placing; see position.] The placing of one thing over another.

supraprotest (sū-prī-prō'test), n. In law, something over (that is, after) protest; an acceptance or a payment of a bill by a third person, made for the honor of the drawer, after protest for non-acceptance or non-payment by the drawee.

suprapubic (sū-prī-pū'bi-ān), a. Same as suprapubic.

suprapubic (sū-prī-pū'bik), a. Situated above the pubis; prepubic.

suprapubically (sū-prī-pū'bi-kāl-i), adv. Above the pubis. Lancet, No. 3515, p. 87.

suprapyggal (sū-prī-pū'gāl), a. [< L. supra, over, + pygal, the rump; see pygal.] Situated over the rump; specifically noting certain plates of the carapace of some turtles.

There is, moreover, a full series of neural bones, of which the 5th articulates with the 1st suprapyggal. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLV, 515.

suprarectus (sū-prī-rek'tus), n.; pl. suprarecti (-tī). The upper straight muscle of the eyeball; the rectus superior, which rolls the eye upward. See cut under eyeball. Coues, 1887.

suprarenal (sū-prī-rē'nal), a. and n. I. a. Situated upon or over the kidneys; specifically, adrenal. Accessory suprarenal bodies, small bodies sometimes found in the ligamenta lata, corresponding in structure usually to the cortical substance of an adrenal. — Suprarenal artery, a branch of the abdominal aorta, supplying the suprarenal capsules. — Suprarenal capsule or body. See capsule. — Suprarenal ganglion, gland, plexus. See the nouns. — Suprarenal melanoma. Same as Addison's disease (which see, under disease).

Suprarenal veins, veins draining the adrenals, and emptying on the right side into the vena cava, and on the left into the left renal or phrenic vein.

II. n. A suprarenal capsule; an adrenal. Also surrenal.

suprarilyglottideus (sū-prī-rī-glo-tid'ē-us), n.; pl. suprarilyglottidei (-ī). [NL.] The superior aryteno-epiglottidean muscle of the larynx. Coues, 1887.

suprascapula (sū-prī-skap'ū-lā), n.; pl. suprascapulae (-lā). [NL. < L. supra, over, + scapula, the shoulder.] 1. A bone developed in ordinary fishes in the shoulder-girdle, and immediately connected with the cranium. Also called post-temporal. See cut 1 under teleost. — 2. A superior scapular element of some batrachians and reptiles. See cuts under omosternum and sternum.

suprascapular (sū-prī-skap'ū-lār), a. Situated above or on the upper part of the scapula; lying or running on the side of the scapula nearest the head; precapular; proximal or superior with reference to the scapular arch; of or pertaining to the suprascapula. Also superescapular. — Suprascapular artery, one of three branches of the thyroid axis, running outward across the root of the neck, between the scalenus anticus and the sternocleidomastoid, beneath the posterior belly of the omohyoid, to the upper border of the scapula, where it passes by the suprascapular notch to the supraspinous fossa, and ramifies on the dorsum of the shoulder-blade. — Suprascapular nerve, a branch from the cord formed by the fifth and sixth cervical of the brachial plexus, distributed to the shoulder-joint and the supraspinatus and infraspinatus muscles. Also called scapularis. — Suprascapular notch. See notch, and cut under shoulder-blade. — Suprascapular region. See region. — Suprascapular vein, a certain tributary of the external jugular vein, entering it near its termination.

suprasensible (sū-prī-sen'si-bl), a. Above or beyond the reach of the senses; supersensuous.

Also used substantively.

By no possible exaltation of an organ of sense could the supra-sensible be reached.

G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, II, 195.

supraseptal (sū-prī-sep'tal), a. Situated above a septum; noting an upper cavity divided by a septum from a lower one. Micros. Sci., XXX, 137.

supraserratus (sū-prī-se-rā'tus), n.; pl. supraserrati (-tī). [NL.] The posterior superior serrate muscle of the back, usually called serratus posticus superior. Coues and Shute, 1887.

supraspinal (sū-prī-spi'nal), a. Situated above (dorsal of) the spine or spinal column; dorsal; neural; epaxial.

supraspinalis (sū prī-spi-nā'lis), n.; pl. supraspinales (-lēs). [NL.: see supraspinal.] One of a series of small muscles which pass between and lie upon the spinous processes of the cervical vertebrae.

supraspinatus (sū-prī-spi-nā'tus), n.; pl. supraspinati (-tī). [NL.] A muscle arising from the supraspinous fossa of the scapula, and inserted into the uppermost facet of the greater tuberosity of the humerus. It acts with the infraspinatus and teres minor in rotating the humerus, all three being antagonized by the subscapularis.

supraspinous (sū-prī-spi'nus), a. 1. Situated upon or over the spinous process of a vertebra. — 2. Superior with reference to the spine of the scapula; precapular. — Supraspinous aponeurosis, the supraspinous fascia. — Supraspinous artery, a branch of the transverse cervical artery which ramifies on the surface of the supraspinous muscle. — Supraspinous fascia, fossa, etc. See the nouns, and cut under shoulder-blade. — Supraspinous ligament, bundles of longitudinal fibers which connect the tips of the spinous processes from the seventh cervical vertebra to the sacrum, forming a continuous cord. The extension of this ligament to the head in some animals is specialized as the ligamentum nuchae. See cut under ligamentum.

suprastapedial (sū-prā-stā-pē'di-āl), a. Situated above the stapes; noting a part of the stapes or columella of many vertebrates which lies above the mediostapedial part, or that representative of the same part which is the proximal extremity of the hyoidean arch. This is variously homologized in different cases. See cuts under stapes and hyoid.

suprasternal (sū-prā-stēr'nal), a. Situated above or in front of (cephalad of) the sternum; presternal. — Suprasternal artery, a branch of the supraclavicular artery which crosses the inner end of the clavicle, and is distributed to the integument of the chest.

— Suprasternal nerve. See supracavicular nerves, under supracavicular. — Suprasternal notch. See notch. — Suprasternal region, the region on the front of the neck between the two supracavicular regions.

suprastigmatal (sū-prī-stig'mā-tal), a. In entom., placed above the stigmata or breathing-pores; as, a suprastigmatal line.

supratemporal (sū-prī-tem'pō-ral), a. and n. I. a. Placed high up in the temporal region or fossa; superior, as one of the collection of bones called temporal. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLIV, 139.

II. n. A wrong name of the true squamosal bone of some animals, as ichthyosaurs. Owen.

supraterrrestrial (sū-prī-te-res'tri-āl), a. Same as superterrestrial. Andover Rev., VII, 42.

suprathoracic (sū-prī-thō-ras'tik), a. 1. Situated above (cephalad of) the thorax. — 2. Situated in the upper part of the thorax, as an upper set of intercostal nerves. Compare infra-thoracic.

supratrochlear (sū-prī-trok'lē-ār), a. 1. Situated over the inner angle of the orbit of the eye, where the tendon of the superior oblique muscle passes through its pulley or trochlea; as, the supratrochlear nerve. — 2. Situated on the inner condyle of the humerus, above the trochlear surface with which the ulna articulates; epitrochlear; supracondylar; as, the supratrochlear notch. See cut under supracondylar. — Supratrochlear nerve, a small branch of the frontal nerve from the ophthalmic branch of the fifth nerve, distributed to the corrugator supercilii and occipitofrontalis muscles and the integument of the forehead.

supratympanic (sū-prī-tim-pā'n'ik), a. In anat.: (a) Situated over or above the tympanum, or tympanic cavity, of the ear. (b) Superior in respect of the tympanic bone. W. H. Flower, Osteology, p. 208. [The two senses coincide or not in different cases.] — Supratympanic bulla, an inflated and hollowed formation of bone above the tympanic cavity of some mammals, apparently in the periotic or tympanoperiotic bone, and supplementary to the usual tympanic bulla. It attains great size in some rodents, as jerboas, chinchillas, and especially the kangaroo-rats of the genus Dipodomys, forming a large smooth rounded protuberance on the posterolateral aspect of the skull, between the squamosal, parietal, and occipital bones.

The large supratympanic or mastoid bulla of Perdites cafer. W. H. Flower, Osteology, p. 157.

supravaginal (sū-prā-vā'j-i-nal), a. [< L. supra, above, + vagina, vagina; see vaginal.] 1. Superior in respect of a sheath or sheathing membrane. (a) Lying on the outside of such a formation. (b) Forming an upper one of parts which unite in a sheath. 2. Situated above the vagina.

supravisition (sū-prī-vizh'on), [*As if < ML. supravisin(n), < supradicere, oversee, < supra, over, + videre, see; see vision. Cf. supervision.] Supervision.

That he secure the religion of his whole family by a severe supravisition and animadversion.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I, 780.

supravisor (sū-prī-vī-zor), n. [*< ML. supravisor, < supradicere, oversee; see supravisition. Cf. supervisor.] A supervisor; an overseer. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I, 890.

supremacy (sū-prem'ā-si), n. [< OF. supremacia, F. suprême = Sp. supremacia = It. supremazia; as supreme + -acy.] The state of being supreme, or in the highest station of power; also, highest authority or power.

Or seek for rule, supremacy, and sway,
When they [women] are bound to serve, love, and obey.
Shak., T. of the S., v. 2, 163.

Monarchy is made up of two parts, the Liberty of the subject and the supremacy of the King.

Milton, Reformation in Eng., II.

Act of Supremacy. (a) An English statute of 1534 (26 Hen. VIII., c. 1) which proclaimed that Henry VIII. was the supreme head of the English Church. See regal supremacy, below. (b) An English statute of 1558-9 (1 Eliz., c. 1) vesting spiritual authority in the crown, to the exclusion of all foreign jurisdiction. — Oath of supremacy, in Great Britain, an oath denying the supremacy of the Pope in ecclesiastical or temporal affairs in that realm. It was by many statutes required to be taken, along with the oath of allegiance and of abjuration, by persons in order to qualify themselves for office, etc.; but a greatly modified and simpler form of oath has now superseded them. — Papal supremacy, according to the Roman Catholic Church, the supreme authority of the Pope as the vicar on earth of the Lord Jesus Christ over the universal church. — Regal or royal supremacy, in an established church, the authority and jurisdiction exercised by the crown as its supreme earthly head. This authority is not legislative, but judicial and executive only. Henry VIII. was first acknowledged supreme head of the English Church by convocation in 1531, but only with the qualification "so far as may be consistent with the law of Christ"; and this supremacy was confirmed by Parliament to him, his heirs and successors, kings of the realm, in 1534. The title of "supreme head" was altered by Elizabeth to "supreme governor." The meaning of this title is explained in the thirty-seventh of the Thirty-nine Articles. = Syn. Predominance, etc. (see priority). sovereignty, domination, mastery.

supreme (sū-prēm'), a. and n. [Formerly also suprem; < OF. supreme, F. suprême = Sp. Pg. It. supremo, < L. supremus, superl. of superus, that is above, higher, < super, above, upon, over, beyond: see super. Cf. sum, summit.] I. a. 1. Highest, especially in authority; holding the highest place in government or power.

My soul aches
To know, when two authorities are up,
Neither supreme, how soon confusion
May enter 'twixt the gap of both.

Shak., Cor., iii. 1. 110.

God is the Judge or the supreme Arbitrator of the affairs of the world; he pulleth down one and setteth up another.

Night has its first, supreme, forsaken star.

Browning, Stratford, ii. 1.

2. Highest; highest or most extreme, as to degree, import, etc.; greatest possible; utmost; as, supreme love or wisdom; a supreme hour; supreme baseness.

No single virtue we could most commend,
Whether the wife, the mother, or the friend;
For she was all, in that supreme degree
That, as no one prevailed, so all was she.

Dryden, Eleonora, i. 162.

The blessing of supreme repose.

Bryant, Summer Ramble.

3. Last. [Rare.]

Virgins, come, and in a ring
Her supremest requiem sing.

Horriek, Upon a Maide.

Festival of the Supreme Being, a celebration in honor of the Supreme Being, held in France, June 8th, 1794, by decree of the Convention, which declared that "the French people recognized the existence of the Supreme Being." This cult, through the influence of Robespierre, replaced the "Worship of Reason." See Fest of Reason (b), under reason. — Supreme Court. See court.

— Supreme Court of Judicature, in England, a court constituted in 1875 by the union and consolidation of the following courts: the Courts of Chancery, of Queen's Bench, of Common Pleas, of Exchequer, of Admiralty, of Probate, and of Divorce and Matrimonial Cases—such supreme court consisting of two permanent divisions, called the High Court of Justice and the Court of Appeal. — Supreme end, the chief end; the last end in which the appetite or desire is satisfied. — Supreme evil, evil in which no good is mixed. — Supreme genus, in logic. Same as highest genus (which see, under genus). — Supreme good, summum bonum; a good in which there is no evil; something good in the highest possible degree; the perfectly good. Crabbe, Works, IV. 154.

2. In law: (a) To show an omission in: show that the accounting party ought to have charged himself with more than he has. See surcharge and falsification, under surcharge, v. (b) To overstock; especially, to put more cattle into, as a common, than the person has a right to put, or more than the herbage will sustain. — 3. To overcharge; make an extra charge upon.

surcharge (sēr-chärj'), n. [= F. surcharge = Sp. Pg. sobrecarga; from the verb.] 1. A charge or load above another charge; hence, an excessive load or burden; a load greater than can be well borne.

A numerous nobility causeth poverty and inconvenience in a State, for it is a surcharge of expense.

Bacon, Nobility (ed. 1857).

2. A charge or supply in excess of the amount requisite for immediate use, or for the work in hand, as of nervous force or of electricity.

The suddenness and intensity of the shock seem to put a stop to the further elaboration of the nervous power by the central ganglia, and, in proportion as the surcharge distributed among the nervous trunks and branches and other tissues becomes exhausted, the vitality is slowly annihilated. J. M. Carnochan, Operative Surgery, p. 139.

3. In law: (a) An extra charge made by assessors upon such as neglect to make a due return of the taxes to which they are liable. (b) The showing of an omission in an account or something in respect of which the accounting party ought to have charged himself more than he has.—4. In ceram., a painting in a lighter enamel over a darker one which forms the ground; as, a white flower in surcharge on a buff ground.—5. An overcharge beyond what is just and right.—6. Something, as a new valuation, officially printed on the face of a postage-stamp.—Surcharge and falsification. In taking accounts in equity, a surcharge is applied to the balance of the whole account, and supposes credits to be omitted which ought to be allowed; and a falsification applies to some item in the debits, and supposes that the item is wholly false or in some part erroneous.—Surcharge of common, forest, or pasture, the putting in by one who has a joint right in a common of more cattle than he has a right to put in.

surcharged (sér-čhârj'), p. a. Overloaded; overburdened; charged in excess, in any way. Surcharged mine (mînt'). Same as overcharged mine (which see, under mine?).

teenth century until the abandonment of complete armor, but worn less generally after the complete suit of plate had been introduced. See also cut under parent.

A long surcote of pers upon he hadde.

Chaucer, Gen. Pro. to C. T., I. 617.

His surcoat o'er his arms was cloth of Thrace,

Adorned with pearls, all orient, round, and great.

Dryden, Pal. and Arc., iii. 67.

To London to our office, and now had I on the vest and surcoat or tunic, as 'twas call'd, after his May had brought the whole court to it.

Evelyn, Diary, Oct. 30, 1666.

Surcoats seem to have originated with the crusaders, [partly] for the purpose of distinguishing the many different nations serving under the banner of the cross.

S. R. Meyrick, Antient Armour, I. 100.

(b) A garment formerly worn by women in its most familiar form, a jacket reaching only to the hips, and often trimmed with fur, which formed an important part of costume in the fifteenth century.

I clothed hyr in grace and heavenly lyght,

This bloody surcote she hath on me sett.

Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 153.

A duches dere-worthily dyghte in dyapered wedis,

In a surcott of sylke fulle selkouthly hewed.

Morte Arthur (E. E. T. S.), I. 3253.

And Life's bright Brand in her [Health's] white hand doth shine:

Th' Arabian birds rare plumage [platted fine]

Serves her for Sur-coat.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II., The Magnificence.

(c) In her, a representation of the garment laid flat and forming with the sleeves a tau-cross. In this shape it is used as a bearing, and this indicates its old use for actual suspension above a tomb.

surcrease (sér-krēs), n. [= OF. surcrez, surcroist, F. surcroit, increase, excessive growth, < surcroistre, F. surcroitre, increase excessively, grow out, < L. super, over, + crescere, grow: see crescent. Cf. increase.] Abundant or excessive growth or increase.

Their surcrease grew so great as forced them at last

To seek another soil. Drayton, Polyolbion, I. 515.

surcraw, n. [< OF. surcreü, pp. of surcroistre, increase: see surcrease, and cf. accreare (accreare), crew.] Additional collection; augmentation.

2. That cannot be discriminated by the ear (?). Surd modes of articulation. Kenrick.

3. In math., not capable of being expressed in rational numbers: as, a surd expression, quantity, or number. See II., 1.—4. In phonetics, uttered with breath and not with voice; devoid of vocality; not sonant; toneless; specifically applied to the breathed or non-vocal consonants of the alphabet. See II., 2.

In the present state of the question, I regard it as probable that the primitive sounds under discussion were sonant rather than surd. J. Hadley, Essays, p. 183.

5. Meaningless; senseless.

The very ceremonies and figures of the old law were full of reason and signification, much more than the ceremonies of idolatry and magic, that are full of non-significants and surd characters.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

II., n. 1. In math., a quantity not expressible as the ratio of two whole numbers, as $\sqrt{2}$, or the ratio of the circumference of a circle to the diameter. The name surd arises from a mistranslation into Latin of the Greek ἄλογος, which does not mean 'stupid' or 'unreasonable,' but 'inexpressible.'

2. In phonetics, a consonantal sound uttered with breath and not with voice; a non-sonant consonant; a non-vocal alphabetic utterance, as p, f, s, t, k, as opposed to b, v, z, d, g, which are sonants or vocals.—Heterogeneous surds. See heterogeneous.

Elenus, the eldist enyn after hym.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 3906.

7. Out of danger; secure; safe.

When thei vnderstode this, thei toke leve of the quene Eleu and departed fro them all armed, for the contre that thei sholde passe thourgh was not sure, for men of were that ran thourgh the londre. Mertin (E. E. T. S.), i. 125.

If . . . he come to church, take holy water, hear mass devoutly, and take al[ta]r [alt]ar holy-bread, he is sure enough, say the papists.

Bradford, Writings (Parker Soc.), II. 314.

Fear not; the forest is not three leagues off;
If we recover that, we are sure enough.

Shak., T. G. of V., v. 1. 12.

8t. Engaged to marry; betrothed.

The king was sure to Dame Elizabeth Lucy, and her husband before God. Sir T. More, Hist. Rich. III. (Trench.)

I am but newly sure yet to the widow,
And what a rend might this discredit make!

Middleton, Trick to Catch the Old One, iii. 1.

Assure as a gun. See gun. — Be sure. (a) Be certain; do not fail; see to it: as, be sure to go. [Colloq.]

Carry back again this package, and be sure that you are spry!
W. Carleton, Little Black-eyed Rebel.

(b) See to be sure, below. — Sure enough, certainly; without doubt; often used expletively. [Colloq.]

Sho'uff, Prer Fox look over de bank, he did, en dar wuz n'er Fox lookin' at 'im outer de water.

J. C. Harris, Uncle Remus, xiv.

To be sure, or be sure, without doubt; certainly: as, are you going? To be sure I am. [Colloq.]

To be sure, what you say is very reasonable.

Sheridan, School for Scandal, iv. 3.

To have a sure thing, to have a certainty; be beyond the possibility of failure. [Slang.] — To make sure, (a) To make certain; secure so that there can be no failure of the purpose or object.

Give diligence to make your calling and election sure.
2 Pet. i. 10.

(b) To make fast by betrothal; betroth.

Accordilles, i. The betrothing, or making sure of a man and woman together. Cotgrave.

She that's made sure to him she loves not well,
Her banes are asked here, but she weds in hell.

J. Cotgrave, Wits Interpreter (1671), p. 177. (Vares.)

To make sure of. See make. — Syn. 1 and 2. Certain, Positive, etc. See confident.

sure (shōr'), adv. [< sure, a.] 1. Certainly; without doubt; doubtless; surely.

Nay, there's no rousing him; he is bewitch'd, sure.

Fletcher (and another), False One, iii. 2.

As sure as they were borne.

Robin Hood and the Tanner's Daughter (Child's Ballads, (V. 336).

Second-hand vice, sure, of all is the most nauseous.
Steele, Tatler, No. 27.

2t. Firmly; securely.

To will gayne nyckell greme or we ground hane;

And ay the ser that we sit our sure be the harder.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), i. 5627.

suref (shōr'), v. t. [< ME. suren; < sure, a., or by aphesis for assure.] To assure; make certain.

Than thei sured their feithes be-twee hem two to holde these covenantes. Mertin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 625.

For ever blimed of our clearest light;

For ever lamed of our sured might;

Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, p. 443. (Davies.)

surely (shōr'ed-li), adv. Assuredly; securely.

sure-enough (shōr'ē-nūf'), a. [< sure enough, phrase under sure, a.] Genuine; real. [Colloq., U. S.]

It was at once agreed that he "wasn't the sure-enough bronco-buster he thought himself."

T. Roosevelt, The Century, XXXVI. 387.

sure-footed (shōr'fūt'ed), a. 1. Not liable to stumble, slide, or fall; having a firm, secure tread.

Our party sets out, behind two of the small but strong and sure-footed horses of the country, to get a glimpse of what, to two at least of their number, were the hitherto unknown lands of Paynimrie.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 262.

2. Figuratively, not apt to err; not liable to make a slip; trustworthy.

Thus that safe and surefooted interpreter, Alex. Aphrodisius, expounds his master's meaning.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 170.

sure-footedly (shōr'fūt'ed-li), adv. In a sure-footed manner; without stumbling. Unus.

sure-footedness (shōr'fūt'ed-nes), n. The character of being sure-footed.

The sure-footedness of the rope-walker.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 449.

surefully (shōr'fūl-i), adv. [< sure + -ful + -ly.] Securely; safely; carefully. [Rare.]

To leve quietly and surefully to the pleasure of God and according to his lawes.

Laws of Hen. VIII., quoted in Ribton-Turner's Vagrants [and Vagrancy, p. 67.

surely (shōr'li), adv. [< ME. surly, surly; < sure + -ly.] 1. Certainly; infallibly; undoubtedly; assuredly; often used, like doubtless, in a manner implying doubt or question.

They were fully Accordid all in one
That Auferius surely should be the kyng.

Generydes (E. E. T. S.), i. 1317.

In the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die.

Surely I think you have charms.

Shak., M. W. of W., ii. 2. 107.

"Surely," thought Rip, "I have not slept here all night."

Iring, Sketch-Book, p. 55.

2. Firmly; stably; safely; securely.

And that makethe hem flee before hem, because of the smelle; and than thei gadren it surely ynow.

Manderly, Travels, p. 169.

He that walketh uprightly walketh surely. Prov. x. 9.

surement (shōr'ment), n. [ME., also seurement; < sure + -ment.] Surety; security for payment.

I yow relesse, madame, into your hand

Quyt every surement and every bond

That ye han maad to me as heerbefore.

Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, l. 806.

sureness (shōr'nes), n. The state of being sure or certain; certainty. Woodward.

surepel, n. A cover.

The sexte hade a sawtere semliche bowdene

With a surepel of silke sewede fulle faire.

Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 3318.

surest (shōr'z'bi), n. [Also surest; < sure + -st; cf. rudeshy.] One who may be surely depended on.

The switzers doe weare it [the codpiece] as a significant symbole of the assured service they are to doe to the French King, . . . as old *surest*es to serve for all turns.

Cornat, Crudities, I. 42, siz. E.

suretishipt, n. An old spelling of suretyship.

surette (sū-ret'), n. [Prob. so called in ref. to the acid berries: < F. suret, dim. of sur, sour; see sour.] A moderate tree, Byrsomina spicata, of the Mulpihiaceae, found in the West Indies and South America. It has a dark-colored wood, strong and good, but not durable in contact with moisture, and an astringent bark which is exported to England for tanning purposes. The tree is also valued for shade in West Indian coffee-plantations, and it bears yellow acid berries which are edible.

surety (shōr'ti), n.; pl. sureties (-tiz). [< ME. surer, suret, < OF. seurte, surete, F. sureté, < L. securita(-t)s, freedom from care or from danger, safety, security; LL. security for a debt, etc.: see security, of which surety is a doublet, as sure is of secure.] 1. Certainty; indubitableness; especially in the phrase of a surety, certainly, indubitably.

Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not their's.

Gen. xv. 13.

2t. Security; safety.

Never yet thy grace no wight sente

So blisful cause as me my lyf to lede

In alle joy and seurte out of drede.

Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 833.

He hath great expenses, and many occasions to spend much for the defence and surety of his realms and subjects.

Lattimer, 1st Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1549.

3. That which makes sure, firm, or certain; foundation of stability; ground of security.

Myself and all the angelic host . . . our happy state Hold, as you yours, while our obedience holds;

On other surety none.

Milton, P. L., v. 535.

4. Security against loss or damage; security for payment or for the performance of some act.

To this thei accorded, bothe the kyng and the lady and her frendes and the parentes of the buke, and maiden gode surety, bothe on that oon part and the tother.

Mertin (E. E. T. S.), i. 4.

There remains unpaid

A hundred thousand more; in surety of the which

One part of Aquitaine is bound to us.

Shak., L. L. L., ii. 1. 135.

5. One who has made himself responsible for another; specifically, in law, one who has bound himself with or for another who remains primarily liable: one who has contracted with the creditor or claimant that he will be answerable for the debt, default, or misarrangement of another: one who enters into a bond or recognizance or other obligation to answer for another's appearance in court, or for his payment of a debt or his performance of some act, and who, in case of the principal's failure, can be compelled to pay the debt or damages; a bondsman; a bail. The essential elements of the relation are that the surety is liable to the demandant, either directly or in the contingency of non-performance by the principal, and that the principal is liable to indemnify the surety against loss or damage by reason of the engagement of the surety. See note under guarantor.

He that is surety for a stranger shall smart for it.

Prov. xi. 15.

That you may well perceive I have not wrong'd you, One of the greatest in the Christian world Shall be my surety.

Shak., All's Well, iv. 4. 3.

Such as love you

Stand sureties for your honesty and truth.

Ford, Perkin Warbeck, i. 3.

Hence — 6. A sponsor.

This child hath promised by you his sureties to renounce the devil and all his works.

Book of Common Prayer, Public Baptism of Infants.

Surety of the peace, a bond to the people or sovereign, taken by a justice, for keeping the peace.

surety (shōr'ti), v. t. [< surety, n.] To act as surety for; guarantee; be bail or security for.

The jeweller that owes the ring is sent for.

And he shall surety me.

Shak., All's Well, v. 3. 298.

suretyship (shōr'ti-ship), n. [Formerly also suretyship, suretyship; < surety + -ship.] The state of being surety; the obligation of a person to answer for the debt, fault, or conduct of another.

The truth was that the man was bound in a perillous suretyship, and could not be merrie.

Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1777), p. 394.

He that hatch suretyship is sure.

Prov. xi. 15.

By suretyship and borrowing they will willingly undo all their associates and allies.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 181.

surf (sérf), n. [An altered form (scarcely found before the 18th century, and prob. simulating surge) of *surf*¹ (early mod. E. sufl, se. souf), a phonetic spelling of sough, orig. a rushing sound; see *sough*¹. The proposed derivation from OF. surflot, the rising of billow upon billow, is untenable. Cf. *surf*² for *sough*².] The swell of the sea which breaks upon the shore, or upon banks or rocks.

My Raft was now strong enough; . . . my next care was . . . how to preserve what I laid upon it from the surf of the Sea.

Defoe, Robinson Crusoe (ed. 1719), i. (Skeat.)

As o'er the surf the bending main-mast hung,

Still on the rigging thirty seamen clung.

Falconer, The Shipwreck, iii. (1762).

It is right precious to behold

The first long surf of climbing light

Flood all the thirsty east with gold.

Lowell, Above and Below, ii.

surface (sér'fās), n. and a. [< OF. (and F.) surface, < sur + face, face; taking the place of superficie, < L. superflueus, the upper side, the top, surface; see superfluous.] 1. n. 1. The bounding or limiting parts of a body; the parts of a body which are immediately adjacent to another body or to empty space (or the air); superficies; outside; distinguished as a physical surface.

The whole architecture of the house (in Pompeii) was coloured, but even this was not considered so important as the paintings which covered the flat surfaces of the walls.

J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., I. 370.

2. The boundary between two solid spaces not adjacent to a third; distinguished as a mathematical surface. A surface is a geometrical locus defined by a single general and continuous condition. This condition reduces the points of the surface to a two-dimensional continuum, its enveloping planes to a two-dimensional continuum, and its enveloping straight lines to a three-dimensional continuum. A ruled surface appears to be enveloped by a one-dimensional series of lines; but when imaginary points are considered, this is seen not to be so. A true one-dimensional continuum of lines requires for its determination a threefold condition, and can contain but a finite number (or discrete infinity) of points and of planes. The number of points or planes of a surface which satisfy a twofold additional condition, as that the points shall lie upon a given line, or that the planes shall contain a given line, and the number of lines of the surface which satisfy a threefold additional condition, as that they shall belong to a given plane pencil, are either finite or only discrete infinity. In the former case the surface is said to be algebraical, in the latter transcendental. If the imaginary elements are taken into account, the numbers are constant whatever the special lines or pencils to which they refer may be. The number of points of an algebraical surface which lie upon a given straight line is called the order of the surface; the number of tangent planes which contain a given line is called the class of the surface; and the number of tangent lines which belong to a given plane pencil is called the rank of the surface.

3. Outward or external appearance; what appears on a slight view or without examination.

If we look below the surface of controversy, we shall commonly find more agreement and less disagreement than we had expected.

J. R. Seeley, Nat. Religion, p. 4.

4. In fort., that part of the side which is terminated by the flank prolonged and the angle of the nearest bastion. — Adjunct surface, a surface applicable to another with corresponding elements orthogonal. The two surfaces are associated minimal surfaces. Algebraic surface, a surface which is represented in analytical geometry by an algebraic equation. If imaginary parts of the locus are included it is characterized by having a finite order, class, and rank.

Alyssoid surface, a surface generated by the rotation of the catenary about its base. It is the only surface of revolution for which the principal radii of curvature are everywhere equal and opposite. — Anallagmatic, anti-surface-motion (sêr'fâs-mô'shən), n. Motion at the surface.

surface-plane (sér'fās-plān), n. A power-machine for dressing lumber, finished stuff, etc. It consists of a traveling table in a frame to receive the material and feed it under a rotary cylindrical cutter. A form of the machine employing two or more revolving cutters is called a surfacing-machine. Also called surface-planer.

surface-printing (sér'fās-prin'ting), n. 1. Printing from a raised surface, as from ordinary types and woodcuts; so called to distinguish it from copper- or steel-plate printing, in which the impression is made from lines incised or sunk below the surface. — 2. In calico-printing, the process of printing from wooden rollers on which the design is cut in relief, or formed by inserting pieces of copperplate edgewise. The color is used thick, and is laid on a tightly drawn surface of woolen cloth, from which the cylinder takes it up as it revolves against the cloth surface.

surfact (sér'fā-sér), n. [< surface + -er1.] A machine for planing and giving a surface to wood.

surface-rib (sér'fās-rib), n. See rib1.

surface-road (sér'fās-rōd), n. A railroad upon the surface of the ground, as distinguished from an elevated or an underground railroad.

surface-roller (sér'fās-rō'ler), n. The engraved cylinder used in calico-printing. E. H. Knight.

surface-tension (sér'fās-ten'shon), n. The tension of the surface-film of a liquid due to cohesion. This serves to explain many of the phenomena of capillarity.

surface-towing (sér'fās-tō'ing), n. The collecting of objects of natural history from the surface of the sea; distinguished from dredging. Science, V. 213. [Rare.]

surface-velocity (sér'fās-vel'os'i-ti), n. Velocity at the surface.

surface-water (sér'fās-wā'tēr), n. Water which collects on the surface of the ground, and usually runs off into drains and sewers.

surface-working (sér'fās-wér'king), n. Same as surface-mining.

surface-worm (sér'fās-wérn), n. Same as surface-grub.

surfacing-machine (sér'fā-sing-mā-shēn'), n. 1. A power-machine for finishing metal surfaces by grinding with emery-wheels. One form consists of a large emery-wheel mounted on a stand that supports a table above the wheel. The periphery of the wheel projects slightly through an opening in the table. The work is laid on the table and fed to the wheel over the opening. Another form of machine has an emery-wheel suspended in a swinging frame like a swing-saw. The work is placed under the frame, and the wheel is made to pass over it by swinging the frame. Sometimes called surface-grinding machine.

2. See surface-plane.

surfacing-plane (sér'fā-sing-plān), n. A plane for working flat surfaces; a bench-plane.

surfait, n. An obsolete form of surfeit.

surf-bird (sér'fērd), n. A plover-like bird of the family Aphriza (Aphriza virgata), related to the sandpipers and turnstones. It is about 9½ inches long, dark-brown above, white below, nearly everywhere streaked or spotted in full plumage; the tail is black with white base and tip. This bird inhabits the whole Pacific coast of America from Alaska to Chili. It was originally called boreal and streaked sandpiper (which see, under sandpiper), and lately named plover-billed turnstone.

Surf-bird (Aphriza virgata).

surf-boat (sér'fōt), n. A boat of a peculiarly strong and buoyant type, capable of passing safely through surf.

surf-boatman (sér'fōt mān), n. One who manages a surf-boat. Scribner's Mag., Jan., 1880, p. 323.

surf-clam (sér'fklām), n. The sea-clam, Mac-tra (or Spisula) klotzschiana. [Local, U. S.]

surf-duck (sér'fduk), n. See duck2, surf-scoter, and cuts under Edemia, Pelecanus, and scoter.

surfeit (sér'fit), n. [Early mod. E. also surfait, surfet; < ME. surfait, surfet, surfett, < OF. surfait, surfet, surfet, surfait (= Pr. sobrefait), excess, surfeit, < surfait, surfait, pp. of surfaire, surfaire, F. surfaire, augment, exaggerate, exceed, < L. super, above, + facere, make; see fact, feat.] 1. Excess; specifically (and now usually), excess in eating and drinking; a gluttonous meal by which the stomach is overloaded and the digestion deranged.

Mouth and tongue avoyding alle outrage,
A-gayne the vice of fals detraction,
To do no surfeit in word ne langage.

Political Poesie, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 28.
The sickness that followeth our intemperate surfait.
Sir T. More, Comfort against Trilobation (1573), fol. 15.

This daughter that I tell you of is fall'n
A little crop-sick with the dangerous surfait
She took of your affection.

Fletcher, Tamer Tamed, v. 1.

Contentious snits . . . ought to be spewed out as the surfeit of courts.

Bacon, Judicature (ed. 1857).

Thou tak'st a surfait where thou should'st but taste.

Charles, Emblems, i. 12.

Your Loathing is not from a want of Appetite, then, but from a Surfeit.

Congress, Way of the World, iii. 7.

2. Fullness and oppression of the system, occasioned by excessive eating and drinking.

Too much a surfait breeds, and may our Child annoy;

These fat and luscious meats do but our stomachs cloy.

Drayton, Polyolbion, xv. 49.

3. Disgust caused by excess; satiety; nausea.

Matter and argument have been supplied abundantly, and even to surfeit, on the excellency of our own government.

Burke.

=Syn. Repletion, plethora. See the verb.

surfeit (sér'fit), v. [Early mod. E. also surfet; < surfet, surfet.] 1. trans. 1. To feed so as to oppress the stomach and derange the digestive functions; overfeed so as to produce sickness or uneasiness; overload the stomach of.

The surfeited grooms

Do mock their charge with snores.

Shak., Macbeth, ii. 2. 5.

He that fares well, and will not bless the founders,

Is either surfeited or ill taught, lady.

Beau. and Fl., Scornful Lady, v. 4.

2. To fill to satiety and disgust; cloy; nauseate; as, to surfeit one with eulogies.

Nor more would watch, when sleep so surfeited

Their leaden eye-lids.

Chapman, Odyssey, ii. 582.

=Syn. Satiety, etc. (see satisfy); glut, gorge.

II. intrans. To be fed till the system is oppressed, and sickness or uneasiness ensues.

They are as sick that surfeit with too much as they that starve with nothing.

Shak., M. of V., i. 2. 6.

Within,

The richer sort doe stand vp to the chin

In delicacies, & even with excess

Are like to surfeit.

Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 57.

surfeiter (sér'fit-ēr), n. [< surfet + -er1.] One who surfeits or riots; a glutton; a reveler.

Shak., A. and C., ii. 1. 33.

surfeiting (sér'fit-ing), n. [Verbal n. of surfeit, v.] Excess in eating and drinking; surfeit.

Luke xxi. 34.

surfeit-swelled (sér'fit-sweld), n. Swelled with a surfeit, or excessive eating and drinking or other over-indulgence. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., v. 5. 54. [Rare.]

surf-water (sér'fit-wā'tēr), n. A water reputed to cure surfeits.

Flo. Did you give her aught?

Rich. An easy surf-water, nothing else.

You need not doubt her health.

Ford, 'Tis Pity, iii. 4.

A little cold-stilled red poppywater, which is the true surf-water, with ease and abstinence, . . . often puts an end to several distempers in the beginning.

Locke, Education, § 29.

surfelt, surfelint. See surphul, surphuling.

surfer (sér'fēr), n. [< surf1 + -er1.] The surf-scoter, a duck. F. C. Brown, 1876. [Local, Massachusetts.]

surfet, n. and v. An obsolete form of surfeit.

surf-fish (sér'fīsh), n. Any marine viviparous perch of the family Embiotocidae (or Holocentridae); an embiotocoid; so called on the Pacific coast of the United States, where many species of several genera abound in the surf. The Amphistichus (or Holocentrus) argenteus and Dicentrarchus lateralis and D. jacksoni are characteristic examples. See cuts under Albina, Dicentrarchus, and spacuda.

surfet, v. t. See surphul.

surfman (sér'f mān), n.; pl. surfmen (-men). A man experienced in handling boats amid surf; especially, one employed in the life-saving service.

In addition to these men, there are crews of volunteer surfmen.

The American, IX. 57.

surfmanship (sér'f mān-ship), n. The art or skill of a surfman; skill in managing a surf-boat. [Rare.]

Until 1871 . . . surfmanship was not a standard of qualification.

The Century, XIX. 334.

surfrappé (F. pron. sür-fra-pā'), n. [F., < sur-, over, + frappé, pp. of frapper, strike; see frappe.] In numis., re struck; noting a coin re struck, whether by the city or monarch that originally issued it, or by some other city or monarch, with new types and inscriptions, so as to obliterate wholly or partly the original designs on the coin.

surf-scoter (sér'f skōtēr), n. The surf-duck, Edemia (or Pelecanus) pesceiolata, a large sea-duck of the subfamily Fuligulina, common in North America, chiefly coastwise, and casual in Europe. The length is from 18 to 21 inches, the extent 31 to 36. The male is black, without white on the wings, but with a frontal and a nuchal white area; the bill is variegated with whitish, pinkish, and orange, and has a large black blotch on each side at the base. The female is sooty-brown, silvery-gray below, with whitish loreal and auricular areas on the sides of the head. The young male resembles the female. It abounds in the United States in winter, and breeds in high latitudes. The flesh is fishy, and scarcely eatable. See scoter, and cut under Pelecanus.

surf-smelt (sér'f smelt), n. An argentinoid fish, Hypomesus pretiosus, about 12 inches long, of a light olivaceous color with silvery lateral line, abundant on the Pacific coast of the United States from California northward, spawning in the surf. See Argentinidae and smelt.

surfult, surfuling. See surphul, etc.

surfusion (sér'fūzhon), n. A state of liquefaction when existing at a temperature below that of the normal melting-point (that is, freezing-point) for the given substance. Thus, under certain conditions, water may be cooled a number of degrees below the usual freezing point, and still remain liquid. Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XXXIX. 230.

surf-whiting (sér'fwhīting), n. A sciaenoid fish, Merluccius littoralis, of the coast of South Carolina, resembling the whiting (M. albus), but of a plain silvery color. See whiting.

surf-worn (sér'f wōrn), n. Worn by the action of the surf.

Surf-worn sheets of rock. A. Geikie, Geol. Sketches, ii.

surfy (sér'fī), a. [< surf1 + -y1.] Consisting of or abounding with surf; resembling surf; foaming; marked by much surf.

Scarce had they clear'd the surfy waves

That foam around those frightful caves.

Moore, Lalla Rookh, Fire-Worshippers.

You shall be able to walk on a clear, surfy day, the breakers running white on many sunken rocks.

R. L. Stevenson, Memoirs of an Islet.

surge (sérj), v. i.; pret. and pp. surged, pp. surging. [Early mod. E. also surge; < late ME. surgen, < OF. surgir, rise, ride (as a ship) near the shore, draw near the shore, arrive, land. F. surgir, rise, spring up, arrive, land, earlier in more vernacular form, OF. sordre, sourde (> E. obs. sourd), F. sourdre, = Pr. sorgir, sorgir = Sp. surgir = Pg. sordir, surdur = It. sorgere, rise, < L. surgere, contr. of surgere, subrigere (pp. subrectus, subrectus), tr. lift up, raise, erect, intr. rise, arise, get up, spring up, grow, etc., < sub, under, from under, + regere, stretch; see regent. Shak., 1 Hen. VI., i. 3. 1.

4. To determine the boundaries, extent, position, etc., of, as of any part of the earth's surface by means of linear and angular measurements, and the application of the principles of geometry and trigonometry; determine the form and dimensions of, as of tracts of ground, coasts, harbors, etc., so as to be able to delineate their several shapes and positions on paper. See surveying.

Surveying a place, according to my idea, is taking a geometrical plan of it, in which every place is to have its true situation. Cook, Second Voyage, iii. 7.

The commissioners were also empowered to survey the lands adjoining to the city of London, its suburbs, and within two miles circuit.

Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 118.

5. To examine and ascertain, as the boundaries and royalties of a manor, the tenure of the tenants, and the rent and value of the same.—6*t.* To see; perceive; observe.

The Norweyan lord, surveying vantage,
With furbish'd arms and new supplies of men Began a fresh assault. Shak., Macbeth, l. 2. 31.

survey (sér-vä'), now sometimes also sér'vā), n. [< survey, v.] 1. A general view; a comprehensive prospect.

Time, that takes survey of all the world,
Must have a stop. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., v. 4. 82.

Under his proud survey the city lies.

Sir J. Denham, Cooper's Hill, l. 25.

What I purpose to do . . . is . . . to attempt a sketch or survey of the different forms and phases which gambling has assumed at the present day in this country.

Nineteenth Century, XXVI. 841.

2. A particular view; an examination or inspection of all the parts or particulars of a thing, with a design to ascertain the condition, quantity, or quality: as, a survey of the stores, provisions, or munitions of a ship; a survey of roads and bridges; a survey of buildings intended to ascertain their condition, value, and exposure to fire.

The Certifyeath of the Survey of alle the late Collagys, Chauntries, free chappelles, fraternities, brotherdes, and Gnyldes.

English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 603.

O that you could turn your eyes toward the napes of your necks, and make but an interior survey of your good selves!

Shak., Cor., ii. 1. 44.

3. In insurance, a plan or description, or both, of the present existing state or condition of the thing insured, including commonly in applications for fire-insurance the present mode of use so far as material to the risk: more loosely, the description or representations, including interrogatories and answers, constituting the application drawn up or adopted by the agent of the insurer.—4. The operation of finding the contour, dimensions, position, or other particulars of any part of the earth's surface, coast, harbor, tract of land, etc., and representing the same on paper; also, the measured plan, account, or exposition of such an operation. See surveying, and ordnance survey (under ordnance).

The survey is not that which is required in order to obtain a patent, but merely the measuring off of the claim by metres and bounds and courses and distances.

Wade, Mining Law, p. 46.

5. A species of auction, in which farms are disposed of for a period covering three lives. [Prov. Eng.]—6. A district for the collection of the customs, under the inspection and authority of a particular officer. [U. S.]—Coast and Geodetic Survey, a survey of the coasts and rivers of the United States, carried out by an office of the Treasury Department, called by this name. The Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey is charged with this work, and with the publication of annual reports, tide-tables, sailing-directions, and maps and charts. On the other hand, the Director of the Geological and Mineralogical Survey is an officer of the Department of the Interior.—

surveyable (sēr-vā'ā-bl), a. Capable of being surveyed. Carlyle.

surveyal (sēr-vā'al), n. [< survey + -al.] Survey. Barrow, Works, III., Sermon 39.

surveyance (sēr-vā'āns), n. [*< ME. surveiance, survaunce, < OF. survaunce, F. survaunce, oversight, < surveier, oversee; see survey.] Surveyorship; survey.

You're is the charge of al hir surveiance,
Whil that they been under yourre governance.
Chaucer, Physician's Tale, l. 95.

I give you the surveyance of my new bought ground.
Middleton, Solomon Paraphrased, To the Gentlemen-Readers.

surveying (sēr-vā'ing), n. [Verbal n. of survey, v.] The art or the process of determining the boundaries and area of a part of the earth's surface from actual measurement of lines and angles; the art of determining the form, area, surface, contour, etc., of any section of the earth's surface, and delineating the same on a map or plan.

Surveying is the art of determining the relative positions of prominent points and other objects on the surface of the ground, and making a graphical delineation of the included area. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 695.

Land-surveying, the determination of the area, shape, etc., of tracts of land.—Marine or hydrographical surveying, the determination of the forms of coasts and harbors, the positions and distances of objects on the shore, of islands, rocks, and shoals, the entrances of rivers, the depth of water, nature of the bottom, etc.—Military surveying. See reconnaissance.—Plane surveying. See plane.—Topographical surveying, the determination not only of the direction and lengths of the principal lines of a tract to be surveyed, but also of the undulations of the surface, the directions and locations of its watercourses, and all the accidents, whether natural or artificial, that distinguish it from the level plain.

surveying-vessel (sēr-vā'ing-ves'el), n. A vessel fitted for and engaged in the carrying on of a marine survey.

surveyor (sēr-vā'or), n. [< ME. surveior, < AF. surveior; as survey + -or.] 1. One who surveys or views. [Rare.]

The brightest of stars appear the most unsteady and tremulous in their light: not from any quality inherent in themselves, but from the vapors that float below, and from the imperfection of vision in the surveyor.

Landor, Diogenes and Plato.

2. An overseer; a superintendent. [Rare.]

Were't not madness, then,
To make the fox surveyor of the fold?

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 1. 253.

3†. A household officer; a supervisor of the other servants. Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 317.—4. One who views and examines something for the purpose of ascertaining its condition, quantity, or quality; as, a surveyor of roads and bridges; a surveyor of weights and measures.—5. One who measures land, or practices the art of surveying.

What land see'st the worlds surveyor, the Sun,
Can measure in a day, I dare call mine.
Dekker and Ford, Sun's Darling, iii.

6. An officer of the British navy whose duty it is to supervise the building and repairing of ships for the navy.—Marine surveyor. See marine.

—Surveyor of the customs, surveyor of the port, in U. S. revenue laws, an officer at many ports of entry who is subject in general to the direction of the collector of the port, if there be one, and whose duties are to superintend and direct all inspectors, weighers, measurers, and gagers; to report once a week to the collector absence from or neglect of duty of such officers; to visit or inspect vessels arriving and to make return in writing to the collector of all vessels arrived on the preceding day, specifying particulars of vessels; to put on board one or more inspectors immediately after arrival; to ascertain distilled spirits imported, and rate according to laws; to ascertain whether goods imported agree with permits for landing the same; to superintend lading for exportation; and to examine and from time to time, and particularly on the first Mondays in January and July in each year, try the weights, etc., and correct them according to the standards. At ports to which a surveyor only is appointed, it is his duty also to receive and record copies of all manifests transmitted to him by the collector, to record all permits granted by the collector, distinguishing gage, weight, measure, etc., of goods specified, and to take care that no goods be unladen without proper permit.—Surveyors' chain. See chain, 3.—Surveyors' cross, an instrument used by surveyors to establish perpendicular lines. It has four sights set at right angles on a brass cross which can be fastened to a tripod or single staff. When the adjustment of the instrument is such that one pair of sights coincides with a given or base line, a line perpendicular to this can be readily observed or traced by means of the other pair of sights.—Surveyors' level. See level.—Surveyors' pole, a pole usually marked off into foot spaces for convenience in measuring, these being painted in strongly contrasted colors, that it may be readily distinguished from surrounding objects at a distance. It is used in ranging lines.

survise (sēr-viz'), v. t. [< F. survey, superviser.] To look over; supervise.

It is the most vile, foolish, absurd, palpable, and ridiculous escautcheon that ever this eye survised.

E. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, iii. 1.

survivability (sēr-vi-vā-bil'i-ti), n. [< survive + -ability.] Capability of surviving.

It must be held that these rules still determine the survivability of actions for tort, except where the law has been specially modified or changed by statute.

99 N. Y. Reports, 260.

survival (sēr-vi'vāl), n. [< survive + -al.] 1. The act of surviving or outliving; a living beyond the life of another person; in general, the fact of living or existing longer than the persons, things, or circumstances which have formed the original and natural environment; often specifically applied to the case of a rite, habit, belief, or the like remaining in existence after what justified it has passed away.

The occurrence of this D. M. (Dia Maubius, inscribed on tombs by ancient Romans) in Christian epitaphs is an often-noticed case of religious survival.

E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, II. 110.

No small number of what the English stigmatize as Americanisms are cases of survival from former good usage.

Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., ix.

2. One who or that which thus survives, outlives, or outlasts.

Survivals in Negro Funeral Ceremonies. Just before leaving, a woman whom I judged to be the bereaved mother, laid upon the mound two or three infants' toys. Looking about among the large number of graves of children, I observed this practice to be very general.

The Academy, Dec. 28, 1889, p. 442.

Opinions belonging properly to lower intellectual levels, which have held their place into the higher by mere force of ancestral tradition; these are survivals.

E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, II. 403.

3. In biol., the fact of the continued existence of some forms of animal and vegetable life after the time when certain related forms have become extinct; also, the law or underlying principle of such continued existence, as by the process of natural selection: in either case more fully called survival of the fittest, and by implication noting the extinction of other organisms less fitted or unfit to survive the struggle for existence. Survival in this sense simply extends the ordinary application of the word from the individual organism to the species, genus, etc., and takes into account geological as well as historical times. See under selection and species.—Survival of the fittest, a phrase used by Herbert Spencer to indicate the process or result of natural selection (which see, under selection).

Plants depend for their prosperity mainly on air and light. Natural selection will favour the more upright-growing forms; individuals with structures that lift them above the rest are the fittest for the conditions; and by the continual survival of the fittest such structures must become established.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., p. 193.

survivance (sēr-vi'vāns), n. [< F. survivance, < survivant, ppr. of survivre, survive; see survive.] Survivorship. [Rare.]

Bp. Burnet, Hist. Own Times. (Latham.)

survivancy (sēr-vi'vān-si), n. [< F. survivance, < survivant, ppr. of survivre, survive; see survive.] Same as survivance. Bp. Burnet, (Imp. Dict.)

survive (sēr-viv'), v.; pret. and pp. survived, ppr. surviving. [< F. survivre = Pr. sobrevirre = Sp. sobrevirir = Pg. sobrevirer = It. sopravvivere, live longer than, < LL. supervivere, outlive, < L. super, over, + vivere, live; see vivid. (< F. derive, revivre.)] 1. trans. To outlive; live or exist beyond the life or existence of; outlast beyond some specified point of time, or some given person, thing, event, or circumstance; as, to survive one's usefulness.

If thou survive my well-contented day,
When that churl Death my bones with dust shall cover.

Shak., Sonnets, XXXI.

Laborious hinds,

Who had survived the father, served the son.

Coeper, Task, iii. 748.

It is unfortunate that so few early Eubœan inscriptions have survived the accidents of time.

Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, II. 131.

= Syn. Outlive, Survive. See outlive.

II. intrans. To remain alive or in existence; specifically, to remain alive after the death or cessation of some one or something.

Yea, though I die, the scandal will survive
Shak., Lucree, I. 204.

Long as Time, in Sacred Verse survive.

Congreve, Birth of the Muse.

The race survives whilst the individual dies.

Emerson, Hist. Discourse at Concord.

survivency (sēr-vi'ven-si), n. [< LL. superven(t)-s, ppr. of supervenire, outlive; see survive and -cy.] A surviving; survivorship. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

survivor (sēr-vi'vor), n. [< survive + -or.] 1. One who or that which survives after the death of another.

Death is what man should wish. But, oh! what fate Shall on thy wife, thy sad survivor, wait!

Rout.

He was seventy years old when he was left destitute, the survivor of those who should have survived him.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vii.

2. In law, that one of two or more designated persons who lives the longest; usually of two joint tenants, or any two persons who have a joint interest.

survivorship (sēr-vi'vor-ship), n. [< survivor + -ship.] 1. The state of surviving; survival.

We [an ill-assorted couple] are now going into the country together, with only one hope for making this life agreeable, survivorship.

Steele, Tatler, No. 53.

2. In law, the right of a joint tenant or other person who has a joint interest in an estate to take the whole estate upon the death of the other. When there are more than two joint tenants and successive deaths occur, the whole estate remains to the survivors and finally to the last survivor.

3. An expectative to a specified benefice; the right and privilege to be collated in the future to a specified benefice not vacant at the time of the grant.—Chance of survivorship, the chance, according to tables of mortality, that a person of one age has of outliving a person of a different age.

Surya (sūr'yā), n. [< Skt. sūrya, the sun; see sun.] In Hindu myth., the god of the sun.

Sus (sus), n. [< NL. < L. sus = Gr. sūs, a hog, pig; see sows, swine.] A Linnean genus of non-ruminant hoofed quadrupeds, containing all the swine known to him, now restricted to Sus scrofa, the wild boar, and closely related forms, and made type of the family Suidæ. See cut under boar.

susceptibility (su-sep-ti-bil'i-ti), n.; pl. susceptibilities (-tiz). [= *F. susceptibilité = Sp. susceptibilidad = Pg. susceptibilidade = It. suscettibilità, < ML. susceptibilita(t)-s, ppr. of susceptibilis, susceptible; see susceptible.] 1. The state or character of being susceptible; the capability of receiving impressions or change, or of being influenced or affected; sensitiveness.

All deficiencies are supplied by the susceptibility of those to whom they [works of the imagination] are addressed.

Macaulay, John Dryden.

Every mind is in a peculiar state of susceptibility to certain impressions.

W. Wallace, Epicureanism, p. 219.

2. Capacity for feeling or emotion of any kind; sensibility; often in the plural.

So I thought then: I found afterwards that blunt susceptibilities are very consistent with strong propensities.

Charlotte Brontë, Professor, x.

It has become a common-place among us that the moral susceptibilities which we find in ourselves would not exist but for the action of law and authoritative custom on many generations of our ancestors.

T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 206.

Conscience includes not only a susceptibility to feeling of a certain kind, but a power or faculty of recognising the presence of certain qualities in actions (rightness, justice, etc.), or of judging an act to have a certain moral character.

J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 258.

3. Specifically, a special tendency to experience emotion; peculiar mental sensitiveness.

His Born's character seems full of susceptibility; perhaps too much so for its natural vigour. His novels, accordingly, . . . verge towards the sentimental.

Carlyle, German Literature.

In these fits of susceptibility, every glance seemed to him to be charged either with offensive pity or with ill-repressed disgust.

George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, ii. 4.

Magnetic susceptibility, the coefficient of induced magnetization, a quantity, constant for a given substance, which, multiplied by the total force acting upon a particle of a magnetic body, gives the intensity of the magnetization. Stimulus susceptibility. See stimulus.

susceptible (su-sep'ti-bl), a. [*< F. susceptible = Sp. susceptible = Pg. susceptível = It. suscettibile, < ML. susceptibilis, capable, susceptible, < L. suscipere, pp. susceptus, take up, take upon one, undertake, receive; see suscipient.] 1. Capable of receiving or admitting, or of being affected; capable of being, in some way, passively affected; capable (of); accessible (to); commonly with of before a state and to before an agency: as, susceptible of pain; susceptible to flattery; but of is sometimes used also in the latter case.

This subject of man's body is of all other things in nature most susceptible of remedy.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

Hill, who was a very amiable man, was infinitely too susceptible of criticism; and Pope, who seems to have had a personal regard for him, injured those nice feelings as little as possible. L. D'Iraclit, Canon of Authors, II. 88.

It sheds on souls susceptible of light
The glorious dawn of an eternal day. Young.

It now appears that the negro race is, more than any other, susceptible of rapid civilization.

Emerson, Misc., West Indian Emancipation.

Amer. Jour. Sci., XXIX. 3.

4. The act of keeping a person in suspense or doubt.—5. In music: (a) The act, process, or result of prolonging or sustaining a tone in one chord into a following chord, in which at first it is a dissonance, but into which it is immediately merged by a conjunct progression upward or downward. The sounding of the tone in the first chord is called the preparation of the suspension, its dissonant sounding in the second the percussion, and its final passage into consonance the resolution. Usually the term suspension is used only when the resolution is downward, retardation being the common term when the resolution is upward. (See retardation, 4 (b).) When two or more voice-parts undergo suspension at once, the suspension is called double, triple, etc. Suspension was the earliest method selected for introducing dissonances into regular composition. (See preparation, 9 (b).) Its success depends largely on the exact harmonic relations of the suspended tone to the chord in which it is dissonant, and on the way in which its dissonance is rhythmically emphasized. (b) The tone thus suspended.—6. In a vehicle, any method of supporting the body clear of the axles, as by springs, side-bars, or straps.—Bifilar suspension. See bifilar.—Critical suspension of judgment. See critical.—Indagatory suspension of opinion.
